their accessories and subsidiaries at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, in connection with pensions for old age or disability, will not be affected. In return, Germany must pay over to the French State a sum representing the actuarial amounts to which the said employees are entitled.

5.

The value of the property thus ceded to the French State will be determined by the Reparation Commission referred to in Article 233 of Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty.

This value shall be credited to Germany in part payment of the amount due for reparation.

It will be for Germany to indemnify the proprietors or parties concerned, whoever they may be.

6.

No tariff shall be established on the German railways and canals which may directly or indirectly discriminate to the prejudice of the transport of the personnel or products of the mines and their accessories or subsidiaries, or of the material necessary to their exploitation. Such transport shall enjoy all the rights and privileges which any international railway conventions may guarantee to similar products of French origin.

7.

The equipment and personnel necessary to ensure the despatch and transport of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, as well as the carriage of workmen and employees, will be provided by the local railway administration of the Basin.

8.

No obstacle shall be placed in the way of such improvements of railways or waterways as the French State may judge necessary to assure the despatch and the transport of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, such as double trackage, enlargement of stations, and construction of yards and appurtenances. The distribution of expenses will, in the event of disagreement, be submitted to arbitration.

The French State may also establish any new means of communication, such as roads, electric lines and telephone connections which it may consider necessary for the exploitation of the mines.

It may exploit freely and without any restrictions the means of communication of which it may become the owner, particularly those connecting the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries with the means of communication situated in French territory.

The French State shall always be entitled to demand the application of the German mining laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, excepting provisions adopted exclusively in view of the state of war, with a view to the acquisition of such land as it may judge necessary for the exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries.

The payment for damage caused to immovable property by the working of the said mines and their accessories and subsidiaries shall be made in accordance with the German mining laws and regulations above referred to.

Every person whom the French State may substitute for itself as regards the whole or part of its rights to the exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries shall enjoy the benefit of the privileges provided in this Annex.

11.

The mines and other immovable property which become the property of the French State may never be made the subject of measures of forfeiture, forced sale, expropriation or requisition, nor of any other measure affecting the right of property.

The personnel and the plant connected with the exploitation of these mines or their accessories and subsidiaries, as well as the product extracted from the mines or manufactured in their accessories and subsidiaries, may not at any time be made the subject of any measures of requisition.

The exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, which become the property of the French State, will continue, subject to the provisions of paragraph 23 below, to be subject to the régime established by the German laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, excepting provisions adopted exclusively in view of the state of war.

The rights of the workmen shall similarly be maintained, subject to the provisions of the said paragraph 23, as established on November 11, 1918, by the German laws and regulations above referred to.

No impediment shall be placed in the way of the introduction or employment in the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries of workmen from without the Basin.

The employees and workmen of French nationality shall have the right to belong to French labour unions.

13.

The amount contributed by the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, either to the local budget of the territory of the Saar Basin or to the communal funds, shall be fixed with due regard to the ratio of the value of the mines to the total taxable wealth of the Basin.

14.

The French State shall always have the right of establishing and maintaining, as incidental to the mines, primary or technical schools for its employees and their children, and of causing instruction therein to be given in the French language, in accordance with such curriculum and by such teachers as it may select.

It shall also have the right to establish and maintain hospitals, dispensaries, workmen's houses and gardens and other charitable and social institutions.

The French State shall enjoy complete liberty with respect to the distribution, dispatch and sale prices of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries.

Nevertheless, whatever may be the total product of the mines, the French Government undertakes that the requirements of local consumption for industrial and domestic purposes shall always be satisfied in the proportion existing in 1913 between the amount consumed locally and the total output of the Saar Basin.

CHAPTER II.

GOVERNMENT OF THE TERRITORY OF THE SAAR BASIN.

16.

The Government of the territory of the Saar Basin shall be entrusted to a Commission representing the League of Nations. This Commission shall sit in the territory of the Saar Basin.

17.

The Governing Commission provided for by paragraph 16 shall consist of five members chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin, not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany.

The members of the Governing Commission shall be appointed for one year and may be re-appointed. They can be removed by the Council of the League of Nations, which will provide for their replacement.

The members of the Governing Commission will be entitled to a salary which will be fixed by the Council of the League of Nations, and charged on the local revenues.

The Chairman of the Governing Commission shall be appointed for one year from among the members of the Commission by the Council of the League of Nations and may be reappointed.

The Chairman will act as the executive of the Commission.

Within the territory of the Saar Basin the Governing Commission shall have all the powers of government hitherto belonging to the German Empire, Prussia, or Bavaria, including the appointment and dismissal of officials, and the creation of such administrative and representative bodies as it may deem necessary.

It shall have full powers to administer and operate the railways, canals and the different public services.

Its decisions shall be taken by a majority.

20.

Germany will place at the disposal of the Governing Commission all official documents and archives under the control of Germany, of any German State, or of any local authority, which relate to the territory of the Saar Basin or to the rights of the inhabitants thereof.

21.

It will be the duty of the Governing Commission to ensure, by such means and under such conditions as it may deem suitable, the protection abroad of the interests of the inhabitants of the territory of the Saar Basin.

22.

The Governing Commission shall have the full right of user of all property, other than mines, belonging, either in public or in private domain, to the Government of the German Empire, or the Government of any German State, in the territory of the Saar Basin.

As regards the railways an equitable apportionment of rolling stock shall be made by a mixed Commission on which the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin and the German railways will be represented.

Persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails coming from or going to the Saar Basin shall enjoy all the rights and privileges relating to transit and transport which are specified in the provisions of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty.

The laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, in the territory of the Saar Basin (except those enacted in consequence of the state of war) shall continue to apply.

If, for general reasons or to bring these laws and regulations into accord with the provisions of the present Treaty, it is necessary to introduce modifications, these shall be decided on, and put into effect by the Governing Commission, after consultation with the elected representatives of the inhabitants in such a manner as the Commission may determine.

No modification may be made in the legal régime for the exploitation of the mines, provided for in paragraph 12, without the French State being previously consulted, unless such modification results from a general regulation respecting labour.

In fixing the conditions and hours of labour for men, women and children, the Governing Commission is to take into consideration the wishes expressed by the local labour organisations, as well as the principles adopted by the League of Nations.

Subject to the provisions of paragraph 4, no rights of the inhabitants of the Saar Basin acquired or in process of acquisition at the date of the coming into force of this Treaty, in respect of any insurance system of Germany or in respect of any pension of any kind, are affected by any of the provisions of the present Treaty.

Germany and the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin will preserve and continue all of the aforesaid rights.

The civil and criminal courts existing in the territory of the Saar Basin shall continue.

A civil and criminal court will be established by the Governing Commission to hear appeals from the decisions of the said courts and to decide matters for which these courts are not competent.

The Governing Commission will be responsible for settling the organisation and jurisdiction of the said court.

Justice will be rendered in the name of the Governing Commission.

The Governing Commission will alone have the power of levying taxes and dues in the territory of Saar Basin.

These taxes and dues will be exclusively applied to the needs of the territory.

The fiscal system existing on November 11, 1918, will be maintained as far as possible, and no new tax except customs duties may be imposed without previously consulting the elected representatives of the inhabitants.

The present stipulations will not affect the existing nationality of the inhabitants of the territory of the Saar Basin.

No hindrance shall be placed in the way of those who wish to acquire a different nationality, but in such case the acquisition of the new nationality will involve the loss of any other.

Under the control of the Governing Commission the inhabitants will retain their local assemblies, their religious liberties, their schools and their language.

The right of voting will not be exercised for any assemblies other than the local assemblies, and will belong to every inhabitant over the age of twenty years, without distinction of sex.

29.

Any of the inhabitants of the Saar Basin who may desire to leave the territory will have full liberty to retain in it their immovable property or to sell it at fair prices, and to remove their movable property free of any charges.

30.

There will be no military service, whether compulsory or voluntary, in the territory of the Saar Basin, and the construction of fortifications therein is forbidden.

Only a local gendarmerie for the maintenance of order may be established.

It will be the duty of the Governing Commission to provide in all cases for the protection of persons and property in the Saar Basin.

The territory of the Saar Basin as defined by Article 48 of the present Treaty shall be subjected to the French customs régime. The receipts from the customs duties on goods intended for local consumption shall be included in the budget of the said territory after deduction of all costs of collection.

No export tax shall be imposed upon metallurgical products or coal exported from the said territory to Germany, nor upon German exports for the use of the industries of the territory of the Saar Basin.

Natural or manufactured products originating in the Basin in transit over German territory and, similarly, German products in transit over the territory of the Basin shall be free of all customs duties.

Products which both originate in and pass from the Basin into Germany shall be free of import duties for a period of five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and during the same period articles imported from Germany into the territory of the Basin for local consumption shall likewise be free of import duties.

During these five years the French Government reserves to itself the right of limiting to the annual average of the quantities imported into Alsace-Lorraine and France in the years 1911 to 1913 the quantities which may be sent into France of all articles coming from the Basin which include raw materials and semi-manufactured goods imported duty free from Germany. Such average shall be determined after reference to all available official information and statistics.

No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed upon the circulation of French money in the territory of the Saar Basin.

The French State shall have the right to use French money in all purchases, payments and contracts connected with the exploitation of the mines or their accessories and subsidiaries.

The Governing Commission shall have power to decide all questions arising from the interpretation of the preceding provisions.

France and Germany agree that any dispute involving a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the said provisions shall in the same way be submitted to the Governing Commission, and the decision of a majority of the Commission shall be binding on both countries.

CHAPTER III.

PLEBISCITE.

34.

At the termination of a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the population of the territory of the Saar Basin will be called upon to indicate their desires in the following manner:

A vote will take place by communes or districts, on the three following alternatives: (a) maintenance of the régime established by the present Treaty and by this Annex; (b) union with France; (c) union with Germany.

All persons without distinction of sex, more than twenty years old at the date of the voting, resident in the territory at the date of the signature of the present Treaty, will have the right to vote.

The other conditions, methods and the date of the voting shall be fixed by the Council of the League of Nations in such a way as to secure the freedom, secrecy and trustworthiness of the voting.

The League of Nations shall decide on the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting:

(a) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of the maintenance of the régime established by the present Treaty and this Annex, Germany hereby agrees to make such renunciation of her sovereignty in favour of the League of Nations as the latter shall deem necessary. It will be the duty of the League of Nations to take appropriate steps to adapt the régime definitively adopted to the permanent welfare of the territory and the general interest;

(b) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of union with France, Germany hereby agrees to cede to France in accordance with the decision of the League of Nations all rights and title over the territory specified by the League;

(c) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of union with Germany, it will be the duty of the League of Nations to cause the German Government to be reestablished in the government of the territory specified by the League.

If the League of Nations decides in favour of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold. The price to be paid will be fixed by three experts, one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who shall be neither a Frenchman nor a German, by the Council of the League of Nations; the decision of the experts will be given by a majority.

The obligation of Germany to make such payment shall be taken into account by the Reparation Commission, and for the purpose of this payment Germany may create a prior charge upon her assets or revenues upon such detailed terms as shall be agreed to by the Reparation Commission.

If, nevertheless, Germany after a period of one year from the date on which the payment becomes due shall not have effected the said payment, the Reparation Commission shall do so in accordance with such instructions as may be given by the League of Nations, and, if necessary, by liquidating that part of the mines which is in question.

If, in consequence of the repurchase provided for in paragraph 36, the ownership of the mines or any part of them is transferred to Germany, the French State and French nationals shall have the right to purchase such amount of coal of the Saar Basin as their industrial and domestic needs are found at that time to require. An equitable arrangement regarding amounts of coal, duration of contract, and prices will be fixed in due time by the Council of the League of Nations.

38.

It is understood that France and Germany may, by special agreements concluded before the time fixed for the payment of the price for the repurchase of the mines, modify the provisions of paragraphs 36 and 37.

39.

The Council of the League of Nations shall make such provisions as may be necessary for the establishment of the régime which is to take effect after the decisions of the League of Nations mentioned in paragraph 35 have become operative, including an equitable apportionment of any obligations of the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin arising from loans raised by the Commission or from other causes.

From the coming into force of the new régime, the powers of the Governing Commission will terminate, except in the case provided for in paragraph 35 (a).

In all matters dealt with in the present Annex, the decisions of the Council of the League of Nations will be taken by a majority.

SECTION V.

ALSACE-LORRAINE.

The HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES, recognising the moral obligation to redress the wrong done by Germany in 1871 both to the rights of France and to the wishes of the population of Alsace and Lorraine, which were separated from their country in spite of the solemn protest of their representatives at the Assembly of Bordeaux,

Agree upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE 51.

The territories which were ceded to Germany in accordance with the Preliminaries of Peace signed at Versailles on February 26, 1871, and the Treaty of Frankfort of May 10, 1871, are restored to French sovereignty as from the date of the Armistice of November 11, 1918.

The provisions of the Treaties establishing the delimitation of the frontiers before 1871 shall be restored.

ARTICLE 52.

The German Government shall hand over without delay to the French Government all archives, registers, plans, titles and documents of every kind concerning the civil, military, financial, judicial or other administrations of the territories restored to French sovereignty. If any of these documents, archives, registers, titles or plans have been misplaced, they will be restored by the German Government on the demand of the French Government.

ARTICLE 53.

Separate agreements shall be made between France and Germany dealing with the interests of the inhabitants of the territories referred to in Article 51, particularly as regards their civil rights, their business and the exercise of their professions, it being understood that Germany undertakes as from the present date to recognise and accept the regulations laid down in the Annex hereto regarding the nationality of the inhabitants or natives of the said territories, not to claim at any time or in any place whatsoever as German nationals those who shall have been declared on any ground to be French, to receive all others in her territory, and to conform, as regards the property of German nationals in the territories indicated in Article 51, with the provisions of Article 297 and the Annex to Section IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Those German nationals who without acquiring French nationality shall receive permission from the French Government to reside in the said territories shall not be subjected to the provisions of the said Article.

ARTICLE 54.

Those persons who have regained French nationality in virtue of paragraph 1 of the Annex hereto will be held to be Alsace-Lorrainers for the purposes of the present Section.

The persons referred to in paragraph 2 of the said Annex will from the day on which they have claimed French nationality be held to be Alsace-Lorrainers with retroactive effect as from November 11, 1918. For those whose application is rejected, the privilege will terminate at the date of the refusal.

Such juridical persons will also have the status of Alsace-Lorrainers as shall have been recognised as possessing this quality, whether by the French administrative authorities or by a judicial decision.

ARTICLE 55.

The territories referred to in Article 51 shall return to France free and quit of all public debts under the conditions laid down in Article 255 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 56.

In conformity with the provisions of Article 256 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty, France shall enter into possession of all property and estate, within the territories referred to in Article 51, which belong to the German Empire or German States, without any payment or credit on this account to any of the States ceding the territories.

This provision applies to all movable or immovable property of public or private domain together with all rights whatsoever belonging to the German Empire or German States or to their administrative areas.

Crown property and the property of the former Emperor or other German sovereigns shall be assimilated to property of the public domain.

ARTICLE 57.

Germany shall not take any action, either by means of stamping or by any other legal or administrative measures not applying equally to the rest of her territory, which may be to the detriment of the legal value or redeemability of German monetary instruments or monies which, at the date of the signature of the present Treaty, are legally current, and at that date are in the possession of the French Government.

ARTICLE 58.

A special Convention will determine the conditions for repayment in marks of the exceptional war expenditure advanced during the course of the war by Alsace-Lorraine or by the public bodies in Alsace-Lorraine on account of the Empire in accordance with German law, such as payment to the families of persons mobilised, requisitions, billeting of troops, and assistance to persons who have been evacuated.

In fixing the amount of these sums Germany shall be credited with that portion which Alsace-Lorraine would have contributed to the Empire to meet the expenses resulting from these payments, this contribution being calculated according to the proportion of the Imperial revenues derived from Alsace-Lorraine in 1913.

ARTICLE 59.

The French Government will collect for its own account the Imperial taxes, duties and dues of every kind leviable in the territories referred to in Article 51 and not collected at the time of the Armistice of November 11, 1918.

ARTICLE 60.

The German Government shall without delay restore to Alsace-Lorrainers (individuals, juridical persons and public institutions) all property, rights and interests belonging to them on November 11, 1918, in so far as these are situated in German territory.

ARTICLE 61.

The German Government undertakes to continue and complete without delay the execution of the financial clauses regarding Alsace-Lorraine contained in the Armistice Conventions.

ARTICLE 62.

The German Government undertakes to bear the expense of all civil and military pensions which had been earned in Alsace-Lorraine on date of November 11, 1918, and the maintenance of which was a charge on the budget of the German Empire.

The German Government shall furnish each year the funds necessary for the payment in francs, at the average rate of exchange for that year, of the sums in marks to which persons resident in Alsace-Lorraine would have been entitled if Alsace-Lorraine had remained under German jurisdiction.

ARTICLE 63.

For the purposes of the obligation assumed by Germany in Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty to give compensation for damages caused to the civil populations of the Allied and Associated countries in the form of fines, the inhabitants of the territories referred to in Article 51 shall be assimilated to the above-mentioned populations.

ARTICLE 64.

The regulations concerning the control of the Rhine and of the Moselle are laid down in Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 65.

Within a period of three weeks after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the port of Strasburg and the port of Kehl shall be constituted, for a period of seven years, a single unit from the point of view of exploitation.

The administration of this single unit will be carried on by a manager named by the Central Rhine Commission, which shall also have power to remove him.

This manager shall be of French nationality.

He will reside in Strasburg and will be subject to the supervision of the Central Rhine Commission.

There will be established in the two ports free zones in conformity with Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty.

A special Convention between France and Germany, which shall be submitted to the approval of the Central Rhine Commission, will fix the details of this organisation, particularly as regards finance.

It is understood that for the purpose of the present Article the port of Kehl includes the whole of the area necessary for the movements of the port and the trains which serve it, including the harbour, quays and railroads, platforms, cranes, sheds and warehouses, silos, elevators and hydro-electric plants, which make up the equipment of the port.

The German Government undertakes to carry out all measures which shall be required of it in order to assure that all the making-up and switching of trains arriving at or departing from Kehl, whether for the right bank or the left bank of the Rhine, shall be carried on in the best conditions possible.

All property rights shall be safeguarded. In particular the administration of the ports shall not prejudice any property rights of the French or Baden railroads.

Equality of treatment as respects traffic shall be assured in both ports to the nationals, vessels and goods of every country.

In case at the end of the sixth year France shall consider that the progress made in the improvement of the port of Strasburg still requires a prolongation of this temporary régime, she may ask for such prolongation from the Central Rhine Commission, which may grant an extension for a period not exceeding three years.

Throughout the whole period of any such extension the free zones above provided for shall be maintained.

Pending appointment of the first manager by the Central Rhine Commission a provisional manager who shall be of French nationality may be appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers subject to the foregoing provisions.

For all purposes of the present Article the Central Rhine Commission will decide by a majority of votes.

ARTICLE 66.

The railway and other bridges across the Rhine now existing within the limits of Alsace-Lorraine shall, as to all their parts and their whole length, be the property of the French State, which shall ensure their upkeep.

ARTICLE 67.

The French Government is substituted in all the rights of the German Empire over all the railways which were administered by the Imperial railway administration and which are actually working or under construction.

The same shall apply to the rights of the Empire with regard to railway and tramway concessions within the territories referred to in Article 51.

This substitution shall not entail any payment on the part of the French State.

The frontier railway stations shall be established by a subsequent agreement, it being stipulated in advance that on the Rhine frontier they shall be situated on the right bank.

ARTICLE 68.

In accordance with the provisions of Article 268 of Chapter I of Section I of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, for a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, natural or manufactured products originating in and coming from the territories referred to in Article 51 shall, on importation into German customs territory, be exempt from all customs duty.

The French Government may fix each year, by decree communicated to the German Government, the nature and amount of the products which shall enjoy this exemption.

The amount of each product which may be thus sent annually into Germany shall not exceed the average of the amounts sent annually in the years 1911–1913.

Further, during the period of five years above mentioned, the German Government shall allow the free export from Germany and the free reimportation into Germany, exempt from all customs duties and other charges (including internal charges), of yarns, tissues, and other textile materials or textile products of any kind and in any condition, sent from Germany into the territories referred to in Article 51, to be subjected there to any finishing process, such as bleaching, dyeing, printing, mercerization, gassing, twisting or dressing.

ARTICLE 69.

During a period of ten years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, central electric supply works situated in German territory and formerly furnishing electric power to the territories referred to in Article 51 or to any establishment the working of which passes permanently or temporarily from Germany to France, shall be required to continue such supply up to the amount of consumption corresponding to the undertakings and contracts current on November 11, 1918.

Such supply shall be furnished according to the contracts in force and at a rate which shall not be higher than that paid to the said works by German nationals.

ARTICLE 70.

It is understood that the French Government preserves its right to prohibit in the future in the territories referred to in Article 51 all new German participation:

(1) In the management or exploitation of the public domain and of public services, such as railways, navigable waterways, water works, gas works, electric power, etc.;

(2) In the ownership of mines and quarries of every kind and in enterprises connected therewith;

(3) In metallurgical establishments, even though their working may not be connected with that of any mine.

ARTICLE 71.

As regards the territories referred to in Article 51, Germany renounces on behalf of herself and her nationals as from November 11, 1918, all rights under the law of May 25, 1910, regarding the trade in potash salts, and generally under any stipulations for the intervention of German organisations in the working of the potash mines. Similarly, she renounces on behalf of herself and her nationals all rights under any agreements, stipulations or laws which may exist to her benefit with regard to other products of the aforesaid territories.

ARTICLE 72.

The settlement of the questions relating to debts contracted before November 11, 1918, between the German Empire and the German States or their nationals residing in Germany on the one part and Alsace-Lorrainers residing in Alsace-Lorraine on the other part shall be effected in accordance with the provisions of Section III of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, the expression "before the war" therein being replaced by the expression "before November 11, 1918." The rate of exchange applicable in the case of such settlement shall be the average rate quoted on the Geneva Exchange during the month preceding November 11, 1918.

There may be established in the territories referred to in Article 51, for the settlement of the aforesaid debts under the conditions laid down in Section III of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, a special clearing office, it being understood that this office shall be regarded as a "central office" under the provisions of paragraph 1 of the Annex to the said Section.

ARTICLE 73.

The private property, rights and interests of Alsace-Lorrainers in Germany will be regulated by the stipulations of Section IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 74.

The French Government reserves the right to retain and liquidate all the property, rights and interests which German nationals or societies controlled by Germany possessed in the territories referred to in Article 51 on November 11, 1918, subject to the conditions laid down in the last paragraph of Article 53 above.

Germany will directly compensate her nationals who may have been dispossessed by the aforesaid liquidations.

The product of these liquidations shall be applied in accordance with the stipulations of Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 75.

Notwithstanding the stipulations of Section V of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, all contracts made before the date of the promulgation in Alsace-Lorraine of the French decree of November 30, 1918, between Alsace-Lorrainers (whether individuals or juridical persons) or others resident in Alsace-Lorraine on the one part and the German Empire or German States and their nationals resident in Germany on the other part, the execution of which has been suspended by the Armistice or by subsequent French legislation, shall be maintained.

Nevertheless, any contract of which the French Government shall notify the cancellation to Germany in the general interest within a period of six months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, shall be annulled except in respect of any debt or other pecuniary obligation arising out of any act done or money paid thereunder before November 11, 1918. If this dissolution would cause one of the parties substantial prejudice, equitable compensation, calculated solely on the capital employed without taking account of loss of profits, shall be accorded to the prejudiced party.

With regard to prescriptions, limitations and forfeitures in Alsace-Lorraine, the provisions of Articles 300 and 301 of Section V of Part X (Economic Clauses) shall be applied with the substitution for the expression "outbreak of war" of the expression "November 11, 1918," and for the expression "duration of the war" of the expression "period from November 11, 1918, to the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty."

ARTICLE 76.

Questions concerning rights in industrial, literary or artistic property of Alsace-Lorrainers shall be regulated in accordance with the general stipulations of Section VII of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, it being understood that Alsace-Lorrainers holding rights of this nature under German legislation will preserve full and entire enjoyment of those rights on German territory.

ARTICLE 77.

The German Government undertakes to pay over to the French Government such proportion of all reserves accumulated by the Empire or by public or private bodies dependent upon it, for the purposes of disability and old age insurance, as would fall to the disability and old age insurance fund at Strasburg.

The same shall apply in respect of the capital and reserves accumulated in Germany falling legitimately to other social insurance funds, to miners' superannuation funds, to the fund of the railways of Alsace-Lorraine, to other superannuation organisations established for the benefit of the personnel of public administrations and institutions operating in Alsace-Loraine, and also in respect of the capital and reserves due by the insurance fund of private employees at Berlin, by reason of engagements entered into for the benefit of insured persons of that category resident in Alsace-Loraine.

A special Convention shall determine the conditions and procedure of these transfers.

ARTICLE 78.

With regard to the execution of judgments, appeals and prosecutions, the following rules shall be applied:

(1) All civil and commercial judgments which shall have been given since August 3, 1914, by the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine between Alsace-Lorrainers, or between Alsace-Lorrainers and foreigners, or between foreigners, and which shall not have been appealed from before November 11, 1918, shall be regarded as final and susceptible of immediate execution without further formality.

When the judgment has been given between Alsace-Lorrainers and Germans or between Alsace-Lorrainers and subjects of the allies of Germany, it shall only be capable of execution after the issue of an exequatur by the corresponding new tribunal in the restored territory referred to in Article 51.

(2) All judgments given by German Courts since August 3, 1914, against Alsace-Lorrainers for political crimes or misdemeanors shall be regarded as null and void.

(3) All sentences passed since November 11, 1918, by the Court of the Empire at Leipzig on appeals against the decisions of the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine shall be regarded as null and void and shall be so pronounced. The papers in regard to the cases in which such sentences have been given shall be returned to the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine concerned.

All appeals to the Court of the Empire against decisions of the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine shall be suspended. The papers shall be returned under the aforesaid conditions for transfer without delay to the French Cour de Cassation, which shall be competent to decide them.

(4) All prosecutions in Alsace-Lorraine for offences committed during the period between November 11, 1918, and the coming into force of the present Treaty will be conducted under German law except in so far as this has been modified by decrees duly published on the spot by the French authorities.

ANNEX.

Within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present Treaty the German troops and such officials as may be designated by the Commission set up under the provisions of paragraph 2 shall evacuate the plebiscite area. Up to the moment of the completion of the evacuation they shall refrain from any form of requisitioning in money or in kind and from all acts likely to prejudice the material interests of the country.

Within the same period the Workmen's and Soldiers' Councils which have been constituted in this area shall be dissolved. Members of such Councils who are natives of another region and are exercising their functions at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, or who have gone out of office since March 1, 1919, shall be evacuated.

All military and semi-military unions formed in the said area by inhabitants of the district shall be immediately disbanded. All members of such military organizations who are not domiciled in the said area shall be required to leave it.

The plebiscite area shall be immediately placed under the authority of an International Commission of four members to be designated by the following Powers; the United States of America, France, the British Empire and Italy. It shall be occupied by troops belonging to the Allied and Associated Powers, and the German Government undertakes to give facilities for the transference of these troops to Upper Silesia.

3.

The Commission shall enjoy all the powers exercised by the German or the Prussian Government, except those of legislation or taxation. It shall also be substituted for the Government of the province and the Regierungsbezirk.

It shall be within the competence of the Commission to interpret the powers hereby conferred upon it and to determine to what extent it shall exercise them, and to what extent they shall be left in the hands of the existing authorities.

Changes in the existing laws and the existing taxation shall only be brought into force with the consent of the Commission.

The Commission will maintain order with the help of the troops which will be at its disposal, and, to the extent which it may deem necessary, by means of gendarmerie recruited among the inhabitants of the country.

The Commission shall provide immediately for the replacement of the evacuated German officials and, if occasion arises, shall itself order the evacuation of such authorities and proceed to the replacement of such local authorities as may be required.

It shall take all steps which it thinks proper to ensure the freedom, fairness and secrecy of the vote. In particular, it shall have the right to order the expulsion of any person who may in any way have attempted to distort the result of the plebiscite by methods of corruption or intimidation.

The Commission shall have full power to settle all questions arising from the execution of the present clauses. It shall be assisted by technical advisers chosen by it from among the local population.

The decisions of the Commission shall be taken by a majority vote.

The vote shall take place at such date as may be determined by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, but not sooner than six months or later than eighteen months after the establishment of the Commission in the area.

(b) Were born in the plebiscite area or have been domiciled there since a date to be determined by the Commission, which shall not be subsequent to January 1, 1919, or who have been expelled by the German authorities and have not retained their domicile there.

Persons convicted of political offences shall be enabled to exercise their right of voting.

Every person will vote in the commune where he is domiciled or in which he was born, if he has not retained his domicile in the area.

The result of the vote will be determined by communes according to the majority of votes in each commune.

On the conclusion of the voting, the number of votes cast in each commune will be communicated by the Commission to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, with a full report as to the taking of the vote and a recommendation as to the line which ought to be adopted as the frontier of Germany in Upper Silesia. In this recommendation regard will be paid to the wishes of the inhabitants as shown by the vote, and to the geographical and economic conditions of the locality.

As soon as the frontier has been fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, the German authorities will be notified by the International Commission that they are free to take over the administration of the territory which it is recognised should be German; the said authorities must proceed to do so within one month of such notification and in the manner prescribed by the Commission.

Within the same period and in the manner prescribed by the Commission, the Polish Government must proceed to take over the administration of the territory which it is recognised should be Polish.

When the administration of the territory has been provided for by the German and Polish authorities respectively, the powers of the Commission will terminate.

The cost of the army of occupation and expenditure by the Commission, whether in discharge of its own functions or in the administration of the territory, will be charge on the area.

Poland agrees to take such steps as may be necessary to secure that any such products shall be available for sale to purchasers in Germany on terms as favourable as are applicable to like products sold under similar conditions to purchasers in Poland or in any other country.

ARTICLE 91.

German nationals habitually resident in territories recognised as forming part of Poland will acquire Polish nationality ipso facto and will lose their German nationality.

German nationals, however, or their descendants who became resident in these territories after January 1, 1908, will not acquire Polish nationality without a special authorisation from the Polish State.

Within a period of two years after the coming into force of the present Treaty, German nationals over 18 years of age habitually resident in any of the territories recognised as forming part of Poland will be entitled to opt for German nationality.

Poles who are German nationals over 18 years of age and habitually resident in Germany will have a similar right to opt for Polish nationality.

Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

Persons who have exercised the above right to opt may within the succeeding twelve months transfer their place of residence to the State for which they have opted.

They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in the territory of the other State where they had their place of residence before exercising the right to opt.

In the portion of Upper Silesia submitted to a plebiscite the provisions of this Article shall only come into force as from the definitive attribution of the territory.

There shall be excluded from the share of such financial liabilities assumed by Poland that portion of the debt which, according to the finding of the Reparation Commission referred to in the above-mentioned Article, arises from measures adopted by the German and Prussian Governments with a view to German colonisation in Poland.

In fixing under Article 256 of the present Treaty the value of the property and possessions belonging to the German Empire and to the German States which pass to Poland with the territory transferred above, the Reparation Commission shall exclude from the valuation buildings, forests and other State property which belonged to the former Kingdom of Poland; Poland shall acquire these properties free of all costs and charges.

In all the German territory transferred in accordance with the present Treaty and recognised as forming definitively part of Poland, the property, rights and interests of German nationals shall not be liquidated under Article 297 by the Polish Government except in accordance with the following provisions:

(1) The proceeds of the liquidation shall be paid direct to the owner;

SECTION IX.

EAST PRUSSIA.

ARTICLE 94.

In the area between the southern frontier of East Prussia, as described in Article 28 of Part II (Boundaries of Germany) of the present Treaty, and the line described below, the inhabitants will be called upon to indicate by a vote the State to which they wish to belong:

The western and northern boundary of Regierungsbezirk Allenstein to its junction with the boundary between the Kreise of Oletsko and Angerburg; thence, the northern boundary of the Kreis of Oletsko to its junction with the old frontier of East Prussia.

The German troops and authorities will be withdrawn from the area defined above within a period not exceeding fifteen days after the coming into force of the present Treaty. Until the evacuation is completed they will abstain from all requisitions in money or in kind and from all measures injurious to the economic interests of the country.

On the expiration of the above-mentioned period the said area will be placed under the authority of an International Commission of five members appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. This Commission will have general powers of administration and, in particular, will be charged with the duty of arranging for the vote and of taking such measures as it may deem necessary to ensure its freedom, fairness and secrecy. The Commission will have all necessary authority to decide any questions to which the execution of these provisions may give rise. The Commission will make such arrangements as may be necessary for assistance in the exercise of its functions by officials chosen by itself from the local population. Its decisions will be taken by a majority.

Every person, irrespective of sex, will be entitled to vote who:

(a) Is 20 years of age at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and

(b) Was born within the area where the vote will take place or has been habitually resident there from a date to be fixed by the Commission.

Every person will vote in the commune where he is habitually resident or, if not habitually resident in the area, in the commune where he was born.

The result of the vote will be determined by communes (Gemeinde) according to the majority of the votes in each commune.

On the conclusion of the voting the number of votes cast in each commune will be communicated by the Commission to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, with a full report as to the taking of the vote and a recommendation as to the line which ought to be adopted as the boundary of East Prussia in this region. In this recommendation regard will be paid to the wishes of the inhabitants as shown by the vote and to the geographical and economic conditions of the locality. The Principal Allied and Associated Powers will then fix the frontier between East Prussia and Poland in this region.

If the line fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers is such as to exclude from East Prussia any part of the territory defined in Article 94, the renunciation of its rights by Germany in favour of Poland, as provided in Article 87 above, will extend to the territories so excluded.

As soon as the line has been fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, the authorities administering East Prussia will be notified by the International Commission that they are free to take over the administration of the territory to the north of the line so fixed, which they shall proceed to do within one month of such notification and in the manner prescribed by the Commission. Within the same period and as prescribed by the Commission, the Polish Government must proceed to take over the administration of the territory to the south of the line. When the administration of the territory by the East Prussian and Polish authorities respectively has been provided for, the powers of the Commission will terminate.

Expenditure by the Commission, whether in the discharge of its own functions or in the administration of the territory, will be borne by the local revenues. East Prussia will be required to bear such proportion of any deficit as may be fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

ARTICLE 96.

In the area comprising the Kriese of Stuhm and Rosenberg and the portion of the Kreis of Marienburg which is situated east of the Nogat and that of Marienwerder east of the Vistula, the inhabitants will be called upon to indicate by a vote, to be taken in each commune (Gemeinde), whether they desire the various communes situated in this territory to belong to Poland or to East Prussia.

ARTICLE 97.

On the expiration of the above-mentioned period, the said area will be placed under the authority of an International Commission of five members appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. This Commission, supported if occasion arises by the necessary forces, will have general powers of administration and in particular will be charged with the duty of arranging for the vote and of taking such measures as it may deem necessary to ensure its freedom, fairness and secrecy. The Commission will conform as far as possible to the provisions of the present Treaty relating to the plebiscite in the Allenstein area; its decisions will be taken by a majority.

Expenditure by the Commission, whether in the discharge of its own functions or in the administration of the territory, will be borne by the local revenues.

On the conclusion of the voting the number of votes cast in each commune will be communicated by the Commission to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers with a full report as to the taking of the vote and a recommendation as to the line which ought to be adopted as the boundary of East Prussia in this region. In this recommendation regard will be paid to the wishes of the inhabitants as shown by the vote and to the geographical and economic conditions of the locality. The Principal Allied and Associated Powers will then fix the frontier between East Prussia and Poland in this region, leaving in any case to Poland for the whole of the section bordering on the Vistula full and complete control of the river including the east bank as far east of the river as may be necessary for its regulation and improvement. Germany agrees that in any portion of the said territory which remains German, no fortifications shall at any time be erected.

The Principal Allied and Associated Powers will at the same time draw up regulations for assuring to the population of East Prussia to the fullest extent and under equitable conditions access to the Vistula and the use of it for themselves, their commerce and their boats.

The determination of the frontier and the foregoing regulations shall be binding upon all the parties concerned.

When the administration of the territory has been taken over by the East Prussian and Polish authorities respectively, the powers of the Commission will terminate.

ARTICLE 98.

Germany and Poland undertake, within one year of the coming into force of this Treaty, to enter into conventions of which the terms, in case of difference, shall be settled by the Council of the League of Nations, with the object of securing, on the one hand to Germany full and adequate railroad, telegraphic and telephonic facilities for communication between the rest of Germany and East Prussia over the intervening Polish territory, and on the other hand to Poland full and adequate railroad, telegraphic and telephonic facilities for communication between Poland and the Free City of Danzig over any German territory that may, on the right bank of the Vistula, intervene between Poland and the Free City of Danzig.

Within the same period arms, munitions and war material, including anti-aircraft material, of origin other than German, in whatever state they may be, will be delivered to the said Governments, who will decide as to their disposal.

Arms and munitions which on account of the successive reductions in the strength of the German army become in excess of the amounts authorized by Tables II and III annexed to this Section must be handed over in the manner laid down above within such periods as may be decided by the Conferences referred to in Article 163.

ARTICLE 222.

Germany undertakes:

(1) To give every facility to Commissions to enquire into the cases of those who cannot be traced; to furnish such Commissions with all necessary means of transport; to allow them access to camps, prisons, hospitals and all other places; and to place at their disposal all documents, whether public or private, which would facilitate their enquiries;

(2) To impose penalties upon any German officials or private persons who have concealed the presence of any nationals of any of the Allied and Associated Powers or have neglected to reveal the presence of any such after it had come to their knowledge.

ARTICLE 223.

Germany undertakes to restore without delay from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty all articles, money, securities and documents which have belonged to nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and which have been retained by the German authorities.

ARTICLE 224.

The High Contracting Parties waive reciprocally all repayment of sums due for the maintenance of prisoners of war in their respective territories.

SECTION II.

GRAVES.

ARTICLE 225.

The Allied and Associated Governments and the German Government will cause to be respected and maintained the graves of the soldiers and sailors buried in their respective territories.

They agree to recognise any commission appointed by an Allied or Associated Government for the purpose of identifying, registering, caring for or erecting suitable memorials over the said graves and to facilitate the discharge of its duties.

Furthermore they agree to afford, so far as the provisions of their laws and the requirements of public health allow, every facility for giving effect to requests that the bodies of their soldiers and sailors may be transferred to their own country.

ARTICLE 226.

The graves of prisoners of war and interned civilians who are nationals of the different belligerent States and have died in captivity shall be properly maintained in accordance with Article 225 of the present Treaty.

The Allied and Associated Governments on the one part and the German Government on the other part reciprocally undertake also to furnish to each other:

(1) A complete list of those who have died, together with all information useful for identification;

(2) All information as to the number and position of the graves of all those who have been buried without identification.

PART VII.

PENALTIES.

ARTICLE 227.

The Allied and Associated Powers publicly arraign William II of Hohenzollern, formerly German Emperor, for a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties.

A special tribunal will be constituted to try the accused, thereby assuring him the guarantees essential to the right of defence. It will be composed of five judges, one appointed by each of the following Powers: namely, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.

In its decision the tribunal will be guided by the highest motives of international policy, with a view to vindicating the solemn obligations of international undertakings and the validity of international morality. It will be its duty to fix the punishment which it considers should be imposed.

The Allied and Associated Powers will address a request to the Government of the Netherlands for the surrender to them of the ex-Emperor in order that he may be put on trial.

ARTICLE 228.

The German Government recognizes the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to bring before military tribunals persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war. Such persons shall, if found guilty, be sentenced to punishments laid down by law. This provision will apply notwithstanding any proceedings or prosecution before a tribunal in Germany or in the territory of her allies.

The German Government shall hand over to the Allied and Associated Powers, or to such one of them as shall so request, all persons accused of having committed an act in violation of the laws and customs of war, who are specified either by name or by the rank, office or employment which they held under the German authorities.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before the military tribunals of that Power.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of more than one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before military tribunals composed of members of the military tribunals of the Powers concerned.

In every case the accused will be entitled to name his own counsel.

ARTICLE 230.

The German Government undertakes to furnish all documents and information of every kind, the production of which may be considered necessary to ensure the full knowledge of the incriminating acts, the discovery of offenders and the just appreciation of responsibility.

PART VIII.

REPARATION.

SECTION I.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 231.

The Allied and Associated Governments affirm and Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

ARTICLE 232.

The Allied and Associated Governments recognize that the resources of Germany are not adequate, after taking into account permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present Treaty, to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage.

The Allied and Associated Governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an Allied or Associated Power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general all damage as defined in Annex I hereto.

In accordance with Germany's pledges, already given, as to complete restoration for Belgium, Germany undertakes, in addition to the compensation for damage elsewhere in this Part provided for, as a consequence of the violation of the Treaty of 1839, to make reimbursement of all sums which Belgium has borrowed from the Allied and Associated Governments up to November 11, 1918, together with interest at the rate of five per cent. (5%) per annum on such sums. This amount shall be determined by the Reparation Commission, and the German Government undertakes thereupon forthwith to make a special issue of bearer bonds to an equivalent amount payable in marks gold, on May 1, 1926, or, at the option of the German Government, on the 1st of May in any year up to 1926. Subject to the foregoing, the form of such bonds shall be determined by the Reparation Commission. Such bonds shall be handed over to the Reparation Commission, which has authority to take and acknowledge receipt thereof on behalf of Belgium.

ARTICLE 233.

The amount of the above damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany shall be determined by an Inter-Allied Commission, to be called the Reparation Commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes II to VII inclusive hereto.

This Commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard.

The findings of the Commission as to the amount of damage defined as above shall be concluded and notified to the German Government on or before May 1, 1921, as representing the extent of that Government's obligations.

The Commission shall concurrently draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within a period of thirty years from May 1, 1921. If, however, within the period mentioned, Germany fails to discharge her obligations, any balance remaining unpaid may, within the discretion of the Commission, be postponed for settlement in subsequent years, or may be handled otherwise in such manner as the Allied and Associated Governments, acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Part of the present Treaty, shall determine.

ARTICLE 234.

The Reparation Commission shall after May 1, 1921, from time to time, consider the resources and capacity of Germany, and, after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard, shall have discretion to extend the date, and to modify the form of payments, such as are to be provided for in accordance with Article 233; but not to cancel any part, except with the specific authority of the several Governments represented upon the Commission.

ARTICLE 235.

In order to enable the Allied and Associated Powers to proceed at once to the restoration of their industrial and economic life, pending the full determination of their claims, Germany shall pay in such instalments and in such manner (whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities or otherwise) as the Reparation Commission may fix, during 1919, 1920 and the first four months of 1921, the equivalent of 20,000,000,000 gold marks. Out of this sum the expenses of the armies of occupation subsequent to the Armistice of November 11, 1918, shall first be met, and such supplies of food and raw materials as may be judged by the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations for reparation may also, with the approval of the said Governments, be paid for out of the above sum. The balance shall be reckoned towards liquidation of the amounts due for reparation. Germany shall further deposit bonds as prescribed in paragraph 12 (c) of Annex II hereto.

ARTICLE 236.

Germany further agrees to the direct application of her economic resources to reparation as specified in Annexes, III, IV, V, and VI, relating respectively to merchant shipping, to physical restoration, to coal and derivatives of coal, and to dyestuffs and other chemical products; provided always that the value of the property transferred and any services rendered by her under these Annexes, assessed in the manner therein prescribed, shall be credited to her towards liquidation of her obligations under the above Articles.

ARTICLE 237.

The successive instalments, including the above sum, paid over by Germany in satisfaction of the above claims will be divided by the Allied and Associated Governments in proportions which have been determined upon by them in advance on a basis of general equity and of the rights of each.

For the purposes of this division the value of property transferred and services rendered under Article 243, and under Annexes III, IV, V, VI, and VII, shall be reckoned in the same manner as cash payments effected in that year.

ARTICLE 238.

In addition to the payments mentioned above Germany shall effect, in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Reparation Commission, restitution in cash of cash taken away, seized or sequestrated, and also restitution of animals, objects of every nature and securities taken away, seized or sequestrated, in the cases in which it proves possible to identify them in territory belonging to Germany or her allies.

Until this procedure is laid down, restitution will continue in accordance with the provisions of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and its renewals and the Protocols thereto.

ARTICLE 239.

The German Government undertakes to make forthwith the restitution contemplated by Article 238 and to make the payments and deliveries contemplated by Articles 233, 234, 235 and 236.

ARTICLE 240.

The German Government recognizes the Commission provided for by Article 233 as the same may be constituted by the Allied and Associated Governments in accordance with Annex II, and agrees irrevocably to the possession and exercise by such Commission of the power and authority given to it under the present Treaty.

The German Government will supply to the Commission all the information which the Commission may require relative to the financial situation and operations and to the property, productive capacity, and stocks and current production of raw materials and manufactured articles of Germany and her nationals, and further any information relative to military operations which in the judgment of the Commission may be necessary for the assessment of Germany's liability for reparation as defined in Annex I.

The German Government will accord to the members of the Commission and its authorised agents the same rights and immunities as are enjoyed in Germany by duly accredited diplomatic agents of friendly Powers.

Germany further agrees to provide for the salaries and expenses of the Commission and of such staff as it may employ.

ARTICLE 241.

Germany undertakes to pass, issue and maintain in force any legislation, orders and decrees that may be necessary to give complete effect to these provisions.

ARTICLE 242.

The provisions of this Part of the present Treaty do not apply to the property, rights and interests referred to in Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, nor to the product of their liquidation, except so far as concerns any final balance in favour of Germany under Article 243 (a).

ARTICLE 243.

The following shall be reckoned as credits to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations:

(a) Any final balance in favour of Germany under Section V (Alsace-Lorraine) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe) and Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty;

(b) Amounts due to Germany in respect of transfers under Section IV (Saar Basin) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe), Part IX (Financial Clauses), and Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways);

(c) Amounts which in the judgment of the Reparation Commission should be credited to Germany on account of any other transfers under the present Treaty of property, rights, concessions or other interests.

In no case however shall credit be given for property restored in accordance with Article 238 of the present Part.

ARTICLE 244.

The transfer of the German submarine cables which do not form the subject of particular provisions of the present Treaty is regulated by Annex VII hereto.

ANNEX I.

Compensation may be claimed from Germany under Article 232 above in respect of the total damage under the following categories:

(1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising.

(2) Damage caused by Germany or her allies to civilian victims of acts of cruelty, violence or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labour), wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims.

(3) Damage caused by Germany or her allies in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work, or to honour, as well as to the surviving dependents of such victims.

(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war.

(5) As damage caused to the peoples of the Allied and Associated Powers, all pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalised cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date.

(6) The cost of assistance by the Government of the Allied and Associated Powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.

(7) Allowances by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to the families and dependents of mobilised persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year.

(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labour without just remuneration.

(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the Allied or Associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her allies upon the civilian population.

ANNEX II.

The Commission referred to in Article 233 shall be called "The Reparation Commission" and is hereinafter referred to as "the Commission."

2.

Delegates to this Commission shall be nominated by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. Each of these Powers will appoint one Delegate and also one Assistant Delegate, who will take his place in case of illness or necessary absence, but at other times will only have the right to be present at proceedings without taking any part therein.

On no occasion shall the Delegates of more than five of the above Powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the Commission and to record their votes. The Delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy shall have this right on all occasions. The Delegate of Belgium shall have this right on all occasions other than those referred to below. The Delegate of Japan shall have this right on occasions when questions relating to damage at sea, and questions arising under Article 260 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) in which Japanese interests are concerned, are under consideration. The Delegate of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State shall have this right when questions relating to Austria, Hungary or Bulgaria are under consideration.

Each Government represented on the Commission shall have the right to withdraw therefrom upon twelve months notice filed with the Commission and confirmed in the course of the sixth month after the date of the original notice.

Such of the other Allied and Associated Powers as may be interested shall have the right to appoint a Delegate to be present and act as Assessor only while their respective claims and interests are under examination or discussion, but without the right to vote.

4.

In case of the death, resignation or recall of any Delegate, Assistant Delegate or Assessor, a successor to him shall be nominated as soon as possible.

The Commission will have its principal permanent Bureau in Paris and will hold its first meeting in Paris as soon as practicable after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and thereafter will meet in such place or places and at such time as it may deem convenient and as may be necessary for the most expeditious discharge of its duties.

6.

At its first meeting the Commission shall elect, from among the Delegates referred to above, a Chairman and a Vice-Chairman, who shall hold office for one year and shall be eligible for re-election. If a vacancy in the Chairmanship or Vice-Chairmanship should occur during the annual period, the Commission shall proceed to a new election for the remainder of the said period.

7.

The Commission is authorised to appoint all necessary officers, agents and employees who may be required for the execution of its functions, and to fix their remuneration; to constitute committees, whose members need not necessarily be members of the Commission, and to take all executive steps necessary for the purpose of discharging its duties; and to delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents and committees.

8.

All proceedings of the Commission shall be private, unless, on particular occasions, the Commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons.

9.

The Commission shall be required, if the German Government so desire, to hear, within a period which it will fix from time to time, evidence and arguments on the part of Germany on any question connected with her capacity to pay.

10.

The Commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard, but not to take any part whatever in the decisions of the Commission. The Commission shall afford a similar opportunity to the allies of Germany, when it shall consider that their interests are in question.

11.

The Commission shall not be bound by any particular code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence or of procedure, but shall be guided by justice, equity and good faith. Its decisions must follow the same principles and rules in all cases where they are applicable. It will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims. It may act on any trustworthy modes of computation.

The Commission shall have all the powers conferred upon it, and shall exercise all the functions assigned to it, by the present Treaty.

The Commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this Part of the present Treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, the Commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above as the exclusive agency of the said Governments respectively for receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany under this Part of the present Treaty. The Commission must comply with the following conditions and provisions:

(a) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities and commodities or otherwise, Germany shall be required, under such conditions as the Commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constitute an acknowledgment of the said part of the debt.

(b) In periodically estimating Germany's capacity to pay, the Commission shall examine the German system of taxation, first, to the end that the sums for reparation which Germany is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan, and secondly, so as to satisfy itself that, in general, the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the Powers represented on the Commission.

(c) In order to facilitate and continue the immediate restoration of the economic life of the Allied and Associated countries, the Commission will as provided in Article 235 take from Germany by way of security for and acknowledgment of her debt a first instalment of gold bearer bonds free of all taxes and charges of every description established or to be established by the Government of the German Empire or of the German States, or by any authority subject to them; these bonds will be delivered on account and in three portions, the marks gold being payable in conformity with Article 262 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty as follows:

(1) To be issued forthwith, 20,000,000,000 Marks gold bearer bonds, payable not later than May 1, 1921, without interest. There shall be specially applied towards the amortisation of these bonds the payments which Germany is pledged to make in conformity with Article 235, after deduction of the sums used for the reimbursement of expenses of the armies of occupation and for payment of foodstuffs and raw materials. Such bonds as have not been redeemed by May 1, 1921, shall then be exchanged or new bonds of the same type as those provided for below (paragraph 12, c, (2)).

(2) To be issued forthwith, further 40,000,000,000 Marks gold bearer bonds, bearing interest at 2½ per cent. per annum between 1921 and 1926, and thereafter at 5 per cent. per annum with an additional 1 per cent. for amortisation beginning in 1926 on the whole amount of the issue.

(3) To be delivered forthwith a covering undertaking in writing to issue when, but not until, the Commission is satisfied that Germany can meet such interest and sinking fund obligations, a further instalment of 40,000,000,000 Marks gold 5 per cent. bearer bonds, the time and mode of payment of principal and interest to be determined by the Commission.

The dates for payment of interest, the manner of applying the amortisation fund, and all other questions relating to the issue, management and regulation of the bond issue shall be determined by the Commission from time to time.

Further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the Commission subsequently determines from time to time.

(d) In the event of bonds, obligations or other evidence of indebtedness issued by Germany by way of security for or acknowledgment of her reparation debt being disposed of outright, not by way of pledge, to persons other than the several Governments in whose favour Germany's original reparation indebtedness was created, an amount of such reparation indebtedness shall be deemed to be extinguished corresponding to the nominal value of the bonds, etc., so disposed of outright, and the obligation of Germany in respect of such bonds shall be confined to her liabilities to the holders of the bonds, as expressed upon their face.

(e) The damage for repairing, reconstructing and rebuilding property in the invaded and devastated districts, including reinstallation of furniture, machinery and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the dates when the work is done.

(f) Decisions of the Commission relating to the total or partial cancellation of the capital or interest of any verified debt of Germany must be accompanied by a statement of its reasons.

As to voting, the Commission will observe the following rules:

When a decision of the Commission is taken, the votes of all the Delegates entitled to vote, or in the absence of any of them, of their Assistant Delegates, shall be recorded. Abstention from voting is to be treated as a vote against the proposal under discussion. Assessors have no vote.

On the following questions unanimity is necessary:

(a) Questions involving the sovereignty of any of the Allied and Associated Powers, or the cancellation of the whole or any part of the debt or obligations of Germany;

(b) Questions of determining the amount and conditions of bonds or other obligations to be issued by the German Government and of fixing the time and manner for selling, negotiating or distributing such bonds;

(c) Any postponement, total or partial, beyond the end of 1930, of the payment of instalments falling due between May 1, 1921, and the end of 1926 inclusive;

(d) Any postponement, total or partial, of any instalment falling due after 1926 for a period exceeding three years;

(e) Questions of applying in any particular case a method of measuring damages different from that which has been previously applied in a similar case;

(f) Questions of the interpretation of the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty.

All other questions shall be decided by the vote of a majority.

In case of any difference of opinion among the Delegates, which cannot be solved by reference to their Governments, upon the question whether a given case is one which requires a unanimous vote for its decision or not, such difference shall be referred to the immediate arbitration of some impartial person to be agreed upon by their Governments, whose award the Allied and Associated Governments agree to accept.

Decisions of the Commission, in accordance with the powers conferred upon it, shall forthwith become binding and may be put into immediate execution without further proceedings.

15.

The Commission will issue to each of the interested Powers, in such form as the Commission shall fix:

(1) A certificate stating that it holds for the account of the said Power bonds of the issues mentioned above, the said certificate, on the demand of the Power concerned, being divisible in a number of parts not exceeding five;

(2) From time to time certificates stating the goods delivered by Germany on account of her reparation debt which it holds for the account of the said Power.

The said certificates shall be registered, and upon notice to the Commission, may be transferred by endorsement.

When bonds are issued for sale or negotiation, and when goods are delivered by the Commission, certificates to an equivalent value must be withdrawn.

Interest shall be debited to Germany as from May 1, 1921, in respect of her debt as determined by the Commission, after allowing for sums already covered by cash payments or their equivalent, or by bonds issued to the Commission, or under Article 243. The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. unless the Commission shall determine at some future time that circumstances justify a variation of this rate.

The Commission, in fixing on May 1, 1921, the total amount of the debt of Germany, may take account of interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damage as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921.

In case of default by Germany in the performance of any obligation under this Part of the present Treaty, the Commission will forthwith give notice of such default to each of the interested Powers and may make such recommendations as to the action to be taken in consequence of such default as it may think necessary.

18.

The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances.

19.

Payments required to be made in gold or its equivalent on account of the proved claims of the Allied and Associated Powers may at any time be accepted by the Commission in the form of chattels, properties, commodities, businesses, rights, concessions, within or without German territory, ships, bonds, shares or securities of any kind, or currencies of Germany or other States, the value of such substitutes for gold being fixed at a fair and just amount by the Commission itself.

20.

The Commission, in fixing or accepting payment in specified properties or rights, shall have due regard for any legal or equitable interests of the Allied and Associated Powers or of neutral Powers or of their nationals therein.

21.

No member of the Commission shall be responsible, except to the Government appointing him, for any action or omission as such member. No one of the Allied or Associated Governments assumes any responsibility in respect of any other Government.

22.

Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty this Annex may be amended by the unanimous decision of the Governments represented from time to time upon the Commission.

23.

When all the amounts due from Germany and her allies under the present Treaty or the decisions of the Commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalents, shall have been distributed to the Powers interested, the Commission shall be dissolved.

ANNEX III.

Germany recognises the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to the replacement, ton for ton (gross tonnage) and class for class, of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war.

Nevertheless, and in spite of the fact that the tonnage of German shipping at present in existence is much less than that lost by the Allied and Associated Powers in consequence of the German aggression, the right thus recognised will be enforced on German ships and boats under the following conditions:

The German Government, on behalf of themselves and so as to bind all other persons interested, cede to the Allied and Associated Governments the property in all the German merchant ships which are of 1,600 tons gross and upwards; in one-half, reckoned in tonnage, of the ships which are between 1,000 tons and 1,600 tons gross; in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the steam trawlers; and in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the other fishing boats.

The German Government will, within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to the Reparation Commission all the ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1.

3.

The ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1 include all ships and boats which (a) fly, or may be entitled to fly, the German merchant flag; or (b) are owned by any German national, company or corporation or by any company or corporation belonging to a country other than an Allied or Associated country and under the control or direction of German nationals; or (c) are now under construction (1) in Germany, (2) in other than Allied or Associated countries for the account of any German national, company or corporation.

For the purpose of providing documents of title for the ships and boats to be handed over as above mentioned, the German Government will:

(a) Deliver to the Reparation Commission in respect of each vessel a bill of sale or other document of title evidencing the transfer to the Commission of the entire property in the vessel, free from all encumbrances, charges and liens of all kinds, as the Commission may require;

(b) Take all measures that may be indicated by the Reparation Commission for ensuring that the ships themselves shall be placed at its disposal.

As an additional part of reparation, Germany agrees to cause merchant ships to be built in German yards for the account of the Allied and Associated Governments as follows:

(a) Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission will notify to the German Government the amount of tonnage to be laid down in German shipyards in each of the two years next succeeding the three months mentioned above.

(b) Within two years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission will notify to the German Government the amount of tonnage to be laid down in each of the three years following the two years mentioned above.

(c) The amount of tonnage to be laid down in each year shall not exceed 200,000 tons, gross tonnage.

(d) The specifications of the ships to be built, the conditions under which they are to be built and delivered, the price per ton at which they are to be accounted for by the Reparation Commission, and all other questions relating to the accounting, ordering, building and delivery of the ships, shall be determined by the Commission.

Germany undertakes to restore in kind and in normal condition of upkeep to the Allied and Associated Powers, within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, in accordance with procedure to be laid down by the Reparation Commission, any boats and other movable appliances belonging to inland navigation which since August 1, 1914, have by any means whatever come into her possession or into the possession of her nationals, and which can be identified.

With a view to make good the loss in inland navigation tonnage, from whatever cause arising, which has been incurred during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers, and which cannot be made good by means of the restitution prescribed above, Germany agrees to cede to the Reparation Commission a portion of the German river fleet up to the amount of the loss mentioned above, provided that such cession shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the river fleet as it existed on November 11, 1918.

The conditions of this cession shall be settled by the arbitrators referred to in Article 339 of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty, who are charged with the settlement of difficulties relating to the apportionment of river tonnage resulting from the new international régime applicable to certain river systems or from the territorial changes affecting those systems.

Germany agrees to take any measures that may be indicated to her by the Reparation Commission for obtaining the full title to the property in all ships which have during the war been transferred, or are in process of transfer, to neutral flags, without the consent of the Allied and Associated Governments.

Germany waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any German ships or boats, exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of January 13, 1919, and subsequent Agreements.

The handing over of the ships of the German mercantile marine must be continued without interruption in accordance with the said Agreement.

Germany waives all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved, in which any of the Allied or Associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owners, charterers, insurers or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a Prize Court of Germany or of her allies.

ANNEX IV.

The Allied and Associated Powers require, and Germany undertakes, that in part satisfaction of her obligations expressed in the present Part she will, as hereinafter provided, devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the Allied and Associated Powers, to the extent that these Powers may determine.

(a) Animals, machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character, which have been seized, consumed or destroyed by Germany or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations, and which such Governments, for the purpose of meeting immediate and urgent needs, desire to have replaced by animals and articles of the same nature which are in being in German territory at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty;

(b) Reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window-glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture and like articles of a commercial character which the said Governments desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of the invaded areas.

The lists relating to the articles mentioned in 2 (a) above shall be filed within sixty days after the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The lists relating to the articles in 2 (b) above shall be filed on or before December 31, 1919.

The lists shall contain all such details as are customary in commercial contracts dealing with the subject matter, including specifications, dates of delivery (but not extending over more than four years), and places of delivery, but not price or value, which shall be fixed as hereinafter provided by the Commission.

Immediately upon the filing of such lists with the Commission, the Commission shall consider the amount and number of the materials and animals mentioned in the lists provided for above which are to be required of Germany. In reaching a decision on this matter the Commission shall take into account such domestic requirements of Germany as it deems essential for the maintenance of Germany's social and economic life, the prices and dates at which similar articles can be obtained in the Allied and Associated countries as compared with those to be fixed for German articles, and the general interest of the Allied and Associated Governments that the industrial life of Germany be not so disorganised as to affect adversely the ability of Germany to perform the other acts of reparation stipulated for.

Machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character in actual industrial use are not, however, to be demanded of Germany unless there is no free stock of such articles respectively which is not in use and is available, and then not in excess of thirty per cent. of the quantity of such articles in use in any one establishment or undertaking.

The Commission shall give representatives of the German Government an opportunity and a time to be heard as to their capacity to furnish the said materials, articles and animals.

The decision of the Commission shall thereupon and at the earliest possible moment be communicated to the German Government and to the several interested Allied and Associated Governments.

The German Government undertakes to deliver the materials, articles and animals as specified in the said communication, and the interested Allied and Associated Governments severally agree to accept the same, provided they conform to the specification given, or are not, in the judgment of the Commission, unfit to be utilized in the work of reparation.

The Commission shall determine the value to be attributed to the materials, articles and animals to be delivered in accordance with the foregoing, and the Allied or Associated Power receiving the same agrees to be charged with such value, and the amount thereof shall be treated as a payment by Germany to be divided in accordance with Article 237 of this Part of the present Treaty.

In cases where the right to require physical restoration as above provided is exercised, the Commission shall ensure that the amount to be credited against the reparation obligation of Germany shall be the fair value of work done or materials supplied by Germany, and that the claim made by the interested Power in respect of the damage so repaired by physical restoration shall be discharged to the extent of the proportion which the damage thus repaired bears to the whole of the damage thus claimed for.

As an immediate advance on account of the animals referred to in paragraph 2 (a) above, Germany undertakes to deliver in equal monthly instalments in the three months following the coming into force of the present Treaty the following quantities of live stock:

(1) To the French Government.

500	stallions (3 to 7 years);
30,000	fillies and mares (18 months to 7 years), type: Ardennais, Boulonnais or Belgian;
2,000	bulls (18 months to 3 years);
90,000	milch cows (2 to 6 years);
1,000	rams;
100,000	sheep;
10,000	goats.

(2) To the Belgian Government.

200	stallions (3 to 7 years), large Belgian type;
5,000	mares (3 to 7 years), large Belgian type;
5,000	fillies (18 months to 3 years), large Belgian type;
2,000	bulls (18 months to 3 years);
50,000	milch cows (2 to 6 years);
40,000	heifers;
200	rams;
20,000	sheep;
15,000	sows.

The animals delivered shall be of average health and condition.

To the extent that animals so delivered cannot be identified as animals taken away or seized, the value of such animals shall be credited against the reparation obligations of Germany in accordance with paragraph 5 of this Annex.

Without waiting for the decisions of the Commission referred to in paragraph 4 of this Annex to be taken, Germany must continue the delivery to France of the agricultural material referred to in Article III of the renewal dated January 16, 1919, of the Armistice.

Germany accords the following options for the delivery of coal and derivatives of coal to the undermentioned signatories of the present Treaty.

Germany undertakes to deliver to France seven million tons of coal per year for ten years. In addition, Germany undertakes to deliver to France annually for a period not exceeding ten years an amount of coal equal to the difference between the annual production before the war of the coal mines of the Nord and Pas de Calais, destroyed as a result of the war, and the production of the mines of the same area during the years in question: such delivery not to exceed twenty million tons in any one year of the first five years, and eight million tons in any one year of the succeeding five years.

It is understood that due diligence will be exercised in the restoration of the destroyed mines in the Nord and the Pas de Calais.

Germany undertakes to deliver to Belgium eight million tons of coal annually for ten years.

4.

Germany undertakes to deliver to Italy up to the following quantities of coal:

July 1919 to June 1920		4½	million tons,
— 1920	— 1921	6	—
— 1922	— 1923	8	—
— 1923	— 1924	8½	—
and each of the following five years

At least two-thirds of the actual deliveries to be land-borne.

5.

Germany further undertakes to deliver annually to Luxemburg, if directed by the Reparation Commission, a quantity of coal equal to the pre-war annual consumption of German coal in Luxemburg.

The prices to be paid for coal delivered under these options shall be as follows:

(a) For overland delivery, including delivery by barge, the German pithead price to German nationals, plus the freight to French, Belgian, Italian or Luxemburg frontiers, provided that the pithead price does not exceed the pithead price of British coal for export. In the case of Belgian bunker coal, the price shall not exceed the Dutch bunker price.

Railroad and barge tariffs shall not be higher than the lowest similar rates paid in Germany.

(b) For sea delivery, the German export price f. o. b. German ports, or the British export price f. o. b. British ports, whichever may be lower.

The Allied and Associated Governments interested may demand the delivery, in place of coal, of metallurgical coke in the proportion of 3 tons of coke to 4 tons of coal.

8.

Germany undertakes to deliver to France, and to transport to the French frontier by rail or by water, the following products, during each of the three years following the coming into force of this Treaty:

Benzol	35,000 tons.
Coal tar	50,000 tons.
Sulphate of ammonia	30,000 tons.

All or part of the coal tar may, at the option of the French Government, be replaced by corresponding quantities of products of distillation, such as light oils, heavy oils, anthracene, naphthalene or pitch.

The price paid for coke and for the articles referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be the same as the price paid by German nationals under the same conditions of shipment to the French frontier or to the German ports, and shall be subject to any advantages which may be accorded similar products furnished to German nationals.

10.

The foregoing options shall be exercised through the intervention of the Reparation Commission, which, subject to the specific provisions hereof, shall have power to determine all questions relative to procedure and the qualities and quantities of products, the quantity of coke which may be substituted for coal, and the times and modes of delivery and payment. In giving notice to the German Government of the foregoing options the Commission shall give at least 120 days' notice of deliveries to be made after January 1, 1920, and at least 30 days' notice of deliveries to be made between the coming into force of this Treaty and January 1, 1920. Until Germany has received the demands referred to in this paragraph, the provisions of the Protocol of December 25, 1918, (Execution of Article VI of the Armistice of November 11, 1918) remain in force. The notice to be given to the German Government of the exercise of the right of substitution accorded by paragraphs 7 and 8 shall be such as the Reparation Commission may consider sufficient. If the Commission shall determine that the full exercise of the foregoing options would interfere unduly with the industrial requirements of Germany, the Commission is authorised to postpone or to cancel deliveries, and in so doing to settle all questions of priority; but the coal to replace coal from destroyed mines shall receive priority over other deliveries.

Germany accords to the Reparation Commission an option to require as part of reparation the delivery by Germany of such quantities and kinds of dyestuffs and chemical drugs as the Commission may designate, not exceeding 50 per cent. of the total stock of each and every kind of dyestuff and chemical drug in Germany or under German control at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

This option shall be exercised within sixty days of the receipt by the Commission of such particulars as to stocks as may be considered necessary by the Commission.

Germany further accords to the Reparation Commission an option to require delivery during the period from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty until January 1, 1920, and during each period of six months thereafter until January 1, 1925, of any specified kind of dyestuff and chemical drug up to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent. of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemical drugs during the previous six months period. If in any case the production during such previous six months was, in the opinion of the Commission, less than normal, the amount required may be 25 per cent. of the normal production.

Such option shall be exercised within four weeks after the receipt of such particulars as to production and in such form as may be considered necessary by the Commission; these particulars shall be furnished by the German Government immediately after the expiration of each six months period.

For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 1, the price shall be fixed by the Commission having regard to prewar net export prices and to subsequent increases of cost.

For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 2, the price shall be fixed by the Commission having regard to prewar net export prices and subsequent variations of cost, or the lowest net selling price of similar dyestuffs and chemical drugs to any other purchaser.

All details, including mode and times of exercising the options, and making delivery, and all other questions arising under this arrangement shall be determined by the Reparation Commission; the German Government will furnish to the Commission all necessary information and other assistance which it may require.

5.

The above expression "dyestuffs and chemical drugs" includes all synthetic dyes and drugs and intermediate or other products used in connection with dyeing, so far as they are manufactured for sale. The present arrangement shall also apply to cinchona bark and salts of quinine.

SECTION II.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 245.

Within six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty the German Government must restore to the French Government the trophies, archives, historical souvenirs or works of art carried away from France by the German authorities in the course of the war of 1870–1871 and during this last war, in accordance with a list which will be communicated to it by the French Government; particularly the French flags taken in the course of the war of 1870–1871 and all the political papers taken by the German authorities on October 10, 1870, at the chateau of Cerçay, near Brunoy (Seine-et-Oise) belonging at the time to Mr. Rouher, formerly Minister of State.

ARTICLE 246.

Within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, Germany will restore to His Majesty the King of the Hedjaz the original Koran of the Caliph Othman, which was removed from Medina by the Turkish authorities and is stated to have been presented to the ex-Emperor William II.

Within the same period Germany will hand over to his Britannic Majesty's Government the skull of the Sultan Mkwawa which was removed from the Protectorate of German East Africa and taken to Germany.

ARTICLE 247.

Germany undertakes to furnish to the University of Louvain, within three months after a request made by it and transmitted through the intervention of the Reparation Commission, manuscripts, incunabula, printed books, maps and objects of collection corresponding in number and value to those destroyed in the burning by Germany of the Library of Louvain. All details regarding such replacement will be determined by the Reparation Commission.

Germany undertakes to deliver to Belgium, through the Reparation Commission, within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, in order to enable Belgium to reconstitute two great artistic works:

(2) The leaves of the triptych of the Last Supper, painted by Dierick Bouts, formerly in the Church of St. Peter at Louvain, two of which are now in the Berlin Museum and two in the Old Pinakothek at Munich.

PART IX.

FINANCIAL CLAUSES.

ARTICLE 248.

Subject to such exceptions as the Reparation Commission may approve, a first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present Treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the Allied and Associated Powers during the Armistice or its extensions.

Up to May 1, 1921, the German Government shall not export or dispose of, and shall forbid the export or disposal of, gold without the previous approval of the Allied and Associated Powers acting through the Reparation Commission.

ARTICLE 249.

There shall be paid by the German Government the total cost of all armies of the Allied and Associated Governments in occupied German territory from the date of the signature of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, including the keep of men and beasts, lodging and billeting, pay and allowances, salaries and wages, bedding, heating, lighting, clothing, equipment, harness and saddlery, armament and rolling-stock, air services, treatment of sick and wounded, veterinary and remount services, transport service of all sorts (such as by rail, sea or river, motor lorries), communications and correspondence, and in general the cost of all administrative or technical services the working of which is necessary for the training of troops and for keeping their numbers up to strength and preserving their military efficiency.

The cost of such liabilities under the above heads so far as they relate to purchases or requisitions by the Allied and Associated Governments in the occupied territories shall be paid by the German Government to the Allied and Associated Governments in marks at the current or agreed rate of exchange. All other of the above costs shall be paid in gold marks.

ARTICLE 250.

Germany confirms the surrender of all material handed over to the Allied and Associated Powers in accordance with the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and subsequent Armistice Agreements, and recognises the title of the Allied and Associated Powers to such material.

There shall be credited to the German Government, against the sums due from it to the Allied and Associated Powers for reparation, the value, as assessed by the Reparation Commission, referred to in Article 233 of Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty, of the material handed over in accordance with Article VII of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, or Article III of the Armistice Agreement of January 16, 1919, as well as of any other material handed over in accordance with the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and of subsequent Armistice Agreements, for which, as having nonmilitary value, credit should in the judgment of the Reparation Commission be allowed to the German Government.

Property belonging to the Allied and Associated Governments or their nationals restored or surrendered under the Armistice Agreements in specie shall not be credited to the German Government.

ARTICLE 251.

The priority of the charges established by Article 248 shall, subject to the qualifications made below, be as follows:

(a) The cost of the armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 during the Armistice and its extensions;

(b) The cost of any armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 after the coming into force of the present Treaty;

(c) The cost of reparation arising out of the present Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto;

(d) The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Germany under the Armistice Conventions or under this Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto.

The payment for such supplies of food and raw material for Germany and such other payments as may be judged by the Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations in respect of reparation will have priority to the extent and upon the conditions which have been or may be determined by the Governments of the said Powers.

ARTICLE 252.

The right of each of the Allied and Associated Powers to dispose of enemy assets and property within its jurisdiction at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty is not affected by the foregoing provisions.

ARTICLE 253.

Nothing in the foregoing provisions shall prejudice in any manner charges or mortgages lawfully effected in favour of the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals respectively, before the date at which a state of war existed between Germany and the Allied or Associated Power concerned, by the German Empire or its constituent States, or by German nationals, on assets in their ownership at that date.

ARTICLE 254.

The Powers to which German territory is ceded shall, subject to the qualifications made in Article 255, undertake to pay:

(1) A portion of the debt of the German Empire as it stood on August 1, 1914, calculated on the basis of the ratio between the average for the three financial years 1911, 1912, 1913, of such revenues of the ceded territory, and the average for the same years of such revenues of the whole German Empire as in the judgment of the Reparation Commission are best calculated to represent the relative ability of the respective territories to make payment;

(2) A portion of the debt as it stood on August 1, 1914, of the German State to which the ceded territory belonged, to be determined in accordance with the principle stated above.

Such portions shall be determined by the Reparation Commission.

The method of discharging the obligation, both in respect of capital and of interest, so assumed shall be fixed by the Reparation Commission. Such method may take the form, inter alia, of the assumption by the Power to which the territory is ceded of Germany's liability for the German debt held by her nationals. But in the event of the method adopted involving any payments to the German Government, such payments shall be transferred to the Reparation Commission on account of the sums due for reparation so long as any balance in respect of such sums remains unpaid.

ARTICLE 255.

(1) As an exception to the above provision and inasmuch as in 1871 Germany refused to undertake any portion of the burden of the French debt, France shall be, in respect of Alsace-Lorraine, exempt from any payment under Article 254.

(2) In the case of Poland that portion of the debt which, in the opinion of the Reparation Commission, is attributable to the measures taken by the German and Prussian Governments for the German colonisation of Poland shall be excluded from the apportionment to be made under Article 254.

(3) In the case of all ceded territories other than Alsace-Lorraine, that portion of the debt of the German Empire or German States which, in the opinion of the Reparation Commission, represents expenditure by the Governments of the German Empire or States upon the Government properties referred to in Article 256 shall be excluded from the apportionment to be made under Article 254.

ARTICLE 256.

Powers to which German territory is ceded shall acquire all property and possessions situated therein belonging to the German Empire or to the German States, and the value of such acquisitions shall be fixed by the Reparation Commission, and paid by the State acquiring the territory to the Reparation Commission for the credit of the German Government on account of the sums due for reparation.

For the purposes of this Article the property and possessions of the German Empire and States shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, the Empire or the States, and the private property of the former German Emperor and other Royal personages.

In view of the terms on which Alsace-Lorraine was ceded to Germany in 1871, France shall be exempt in respect thereof from making any payment or credit under this Article for any property or possessions of the German Empire or States situated therein.

Belgium also shall be exempt from making any payment or any credit under this Article for any property or possessions of the German Empire or States situated in German territory ceded to Belgium under the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 257.

In the case of the former German territories, including colonies, protectorates or dependencies, administered by a Mandatory under Article 22 of Part I (League of Nations) of the present Treaty, neither the territory nor the Mandatory Power shall be charged with any portion of the debt of the German Empire or States.

All property and possessions belonging to the German Empire or to the German States situated in such territories shall be transferred with the territories to the Mandatory Power in its capacity as such and no payment shall be made nor any credit given to those Governments in consideration of this transfer.

For the purposes of this Article the property and possessions of the German Empire and of the German States shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, the Empire or the States and the private property of the former German Emperor and other Royal personages.

ARTICLE 258.

Germany renounces all rights accorded to her or her nationals by treaties, conventions or agreements, of whatsoever kind, to representation upon or participation in the control or administration of commissions, state banks, agencies or other financial or economic organisations of an international character, exercising powers of control or administration, and operating in any of the Allied or Associated States, or in Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, or in the dependencies of these States, or in the former Russian Empire.

ARTICLE 259.

(1) Germany agrees to deliver within one month from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, to such authority as the Principal Allied and Associated Powers may designate, the sum in gold which was to be deposited in the Reichsbank in the name of the Council of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt as security for the first issue of Turkish Government currency notes.

(2) Germany recognises her obligation to make annually for the period of twelve years the payments in gold for which provision is made in the German Treasury Bonds deposited by her from time to time in the name of the Council of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt as security for the second and subsequent issues of Turkish Government currency notes.

(3) Germany undertakes to deliver, within one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty, to such authority as the Principal Allied and Associated Powers may designate, the gold deposit constituted in the Reichsbank or elsewhere, representing the residue of the advance in gold agreed to on May 5, 1915, by the Council of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt to the Imperial Ottoman Government.

(4) Germany agrees to transfer to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers any title that she may have to the sum in gold and silver transmitted by her to the Turkish Ministry of Finance in November, 1918, in anticipation of the payment to be made in May, 1919, for the service of the Turkish Internal Loan.

(5) Germany undertakes to transfer to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, within a period of one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty, any sums in gold transferred as pledge or as collateral security to the German Government or its nationals in connection with loans made by them to the Austro-Hungarian Government.

(6) Without prejudice to Article 292 of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, Germany confirms the renunciation provided for in Article XV of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, of any benefit disclosed by the Treaties of Bucharest and of Brest-Litovsk and by the treaties supplementary thereto.

Germany undertakes to transfer, either to Roumania or to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers as the case may be, all monetary instruments, specie, securities and negotiable instruments, or goods, which she has received under the aforesaid Treaties.

(7) The sums of money and all securities, instruments and goods of whatsoever nature, to be delivered, paid and transferred under the provisions of this Article, shall be disposed of by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in a manner hereafter to be determined by those Powers.

ARTICLE 260.

Without prejudice to the renunciation of any rights by Germany on behalf of herself or of her nationals in the other provisions of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission may within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty demand that the German Government become possessed of any rights and interests of German nationals in any public utility undertaking or in any concession operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria, or in the possessions or dependencies of these States or in any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies, to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any Power or to be administered by a Mandatory under the present Treaty, and may require that the German Government transfer, within six months of the date of demand, all such rights and interests and any similar rights and interests the German Government may itself possess to the Reparation Commission.

Germany shall be responsible for indemnifying her nationals so dispossessed, and the Reparation Commission shall credit Germany, on account of sums due for reparation, with such sums in respect of the value of the transferred rights and interests as may be assessed by the Reparation Commission, and the German Government shall, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, communicate to the Reparation Commission all such rights and interests, whether already granted, contingent or not yet exercised, and shall renounce on behalf of itself and its nationals in favour of the Allied and Associated Powers, all such rights and interests which have not been so communicated.

ARTICLE 261.

Germany undertakes to transfer to the Allied and Associated Powers any claims she may have to payment or repayment by the Governments of Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, and, in particular, any claims which may arise, now or hereafter, from the fulfilment of undertakings made by Germany during the war to those Governments.

ARTICLE 262.

Any monetary obligation due by Germany arising out of the present Treaty and expressed in terms of gold marks shall be payable at the option of the creditors in pounds sterling payable in London; gold dollars of the United States of America payable in New York; gold francs payable in Paris; or gold lire payable in Rome.

For the purpose of this Article the gold coins mentioned above shall be defined as being of the weight and fineness of gold as enacted by law on January 1, 1914.

ARTICLE 263.

Germany gives a guarantee to the Brazilian Government that all sums representing the sale of coffee belonging to the State of Sao Paolo in the ports of Hamburg, Bremen, Antwerp and Trieste, which were deposited with the Bank of Bleichröder at Berlin, shall be reimbursed together with interest at the rate or rates agreed upon. Germany having prevented the transfer of the sums in question to the State of Sao Paolo at the proper time, guarantees also that the reimbursement shall be effected at the rate of exchange of the day of the deposit.

PART X.

ECONOMIC CLAUSES.

SECTION I.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

CHAPTER I.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS, DUTIES AND RESTRICTIONS.

ARTICLE 264.

Germany undertakes that goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the Allied or Associated States imported into German territory, from whatsoever place arriving, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges (including internal charges) than those to which the like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such State or of any other foreign country are subject.

Germany will not maintain or impose any prohibition or restriction on the importation into German territory of any goods the produce or manufacture of the territories of any one of the Allied or Associated States, from whatsoever place arriving, which shall not equally extend to the importation of the like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such State or of any other foreign country.

ARTICLE 265.

Germany further undertakes that, in the matter of the régime applicable on importation, no discrimination against the commerce of any of the Allied and Associated States as compared with any other of the said States or any other foreign country shall be made, even by indirect means, such as customs regulations or procedure, methods of verification or analysis conditions of payment of duties, tariff classification or interpretation, or the operation of monopolies.

ARTICLE 266.

In all that concerns exportation Germany undertakes that goods, natural products or manufactured articles, exported from German territory to the territories of any one of the Allied or Associated States shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges (including internal charges) than those paid on the like goods exported to any other such State or to any other foreign country.

Germany will not maintain or impose any prohibition or restriction on the exportation of any goods sent from her territory to any one of the Allied or Associated States which shall not equally extend to the exportation of the like goods, natural products or manufactured articles, sent to any other such State or to any other foreign country.

Every favour, immunity or privilege in regard to the importation, exportation or transit of goods granted by Germany to any Allied or Associated State or to any other foreign country whatever shall simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, be extended to all the Allied and Associated States.

ARTICLE 268.

The provisions of Articles 264 to 267 inclusive of this Chapter and of Article 323 of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty are subject to the following exceptions:

(a) For a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, natural or manufactured products which both originate in and come from the territories of Alsace and Lorraine reunited to France shall, on importation into German customs territory, be exempt from all customs duty.

The French Government shall fix each year, by decree communicated to the German Government, the nature and amount of the products which shall enjoy this exemption.

The amount of each product which may be thus sent annually into Germany shall not exceed the average of the amounts sent annually in the years 1911–1913.

Further, during the period above mentioned the German Government shall allow the free export from Germany, and the free re-importation into Germany, exempt from all customs duties and other charges (including internal charges), of yarns, tissues, and other textile materials or textile products of any kind and in any condition, sent from Germany into the territories of Alsace or Lorraine, to be subjected there to any finishing process, such as bleaching, dyeing, printing, mercerisation, gassing, twisting or dressing.

The amount of each product which may be thus sent annually into Germany shall not exceed the average of the amounts sent annually in the years 1911–1913.

(c) The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to require Germany to accord freedom from customs duty, on importation into German customs territory, to natural products and manufactured articles which both originate in and come from the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, for a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The nature and amount of the products which shall enjoy the benefits of this régime shall be communicated each year to the German Government.

The amount of each product which may be thus sent annually into Germany shall not exceed the average of the amounts sent annually in the years 1911–1913.

ARTICLE 269.

During the first six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the duties imposed by Germany on imports from Allied and Associated States shall not be higher than the most favourable duties which were applied to imports into Germany on July 31, 1914.

During a further period of thirty months after the expiration of the first six months, this provision shall continue to be applied exclusively with regard to products which, being comprised in Section A of the First Category of the German Customs Tariff of December 25, 1902, enjoyed at the above-mentioned date (July 31, 1914) rates conventionalised by treaties with the Allied and Associated Powers, with the addition of all kinds of wine and vegetable oils, of artificial silk and of washed or scoured wool, whether or not they were the subject of special conventions before July 31, 1914.

ARTICLE 270.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to apply to German territory occupied by their troops a special customs régime as regards imports and exports, in the event of such a measure being necessary in their opinion in order to safeguard the economic interests of the population of these territories.

CHAPTER II.

SHIPPING.

ARTICLE 271.

As regards sea fishing, maritime coasting trade, and maritime towage, vessels of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy, in German territorial waters, the treatment accorded to vessels of the most favoured nation.

ARTICLE 272.

Germany agrees that, notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary contained in the Conventions relating to the North Sea fisheries and liquor traffic, all rights of inspection and police shall, in the case of fishing-boats of the Allied Powers, be exercised solely by ships belonging to those Powers.

ARTICLE 273.

In the case of vessels of the Allied or Associated Powers, all classes of certificates or documents relating to the vessel, which were recognised as valid by Germany before the war, or which may hereafter be recognised as valid by the principal maritime States, shall be recognised by Germany as valid and as equivalent to the corresponding certificates issued to German vessels.

A similar recognition shall be accorded to the certificates and documents issued to their vessels by the Governments of new States, whether they have a sea-coast or not, provided that such certificates and documents shall be issued in conformity with the general practice observed in the principal maritime States.

The High Contracting Parties agree to recognise the flag flown by the vessels of an Allied or Associated Power having no sea-coast which are registered at some one specified place situated in its territory; such place shall serve as the port of registry of such vessels.

CHAPTER III.

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

ARTICLE 274.

Germany undertakes to adopt all the necessary legislative and administrative measures to protect goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the Allied and Associated Powers from all forms of unfair competition in commercial transactions.

Germany undertakes to prohibit and repress by seizure and by other appropriate remedies the importation, exportation, manufacture, distribution, sale or offering for sale in its territory of all goods bearing upon themselves or their usual get-up or wrappings any marks, names, devices, or description whatsoever which are calculated to convey directly or indirectly a false indication of the origin, type, nature, or special characteristics of such goods.

ARTICLE 275.

Germany undertakes on condition that reciprocity is accorded in these matters to respect any law, or any administrative or judicial decision given in conformity with such law, in force in any Allied or Associated State and duly communicated to her by the proper authorities, defining or regulating the right to any regional appellation in respect of wine or spirits produced in the State to which the region belongs, or the conditions under which the use of any such appellation may be permitted; and the importation, exportation, manufacture, distribution, sale or offering for sale of products or articles bearing regional appellations inconsistent with such law or order shall be prohibited by the German Government and repressed by the measures prescribed in the preceding Article.

CHAPTER IV.

TREATMENT OF NATIONALS OF ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED POWERS.

ARTICLE 276.

Germany undertakes:

(a) Not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers to any prohibition in regard to the exercise of occupations, professions, trade and industry, which shall not be equally applicable to all aliens without exception;

(b) Not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers in regard to the rights referred to in paragraph (a) to any regulation or restriction which might contravene directly or indirectly the stipulations of the said paragraph, or which shall be other or more disadvantageous than those which are applicable to nationals of the most favoured nation;

(c) Not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers, their property, rights or interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, to any charge, tax or impost, direct or indirect, other or higher than those which are or may be imposed on her own nationals or their property, rights or interests;

(d) Not to subject the nationals of any one of the Allied and Associated Powers to any restriction which was not applicable on July 1, 1914, to the nationals of such Powers unless such restriction is likewise imposed on her own nationals.

ARTICLE 277.

The nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in German territory a constant protection for their persons and for their property, rights and interests, and shall have free access to the courts of law.

ARTICLE 278.

Germany undertakes to recognise any new nationality which has been or may be acquired by her nationals under the laws of the Allied and Associated Powers and in accordance with the decisions of the competent authorities of these Powers pursuant to naturalisation laws or under treaty stipulations, and to regard such persons as having, in consequence of the acquisition of such new nationality, in all respects severed their allegiance to their country of origin.

ARTICLE 279.

The Allied and Associated Powers may appoint consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, and consular agents in German towns and ports. Germany undertakes to approve the designation of the consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, and consular agents, whose names shall be notified to her, and to admit them to the exercise of their functions in conformity with the usual rules and customs.

CHAPTER V.

GENERAL ARTICLES.

ARTICLE 280.

The obligations imposed on Germany by Chapter I and by Articles 271 and 272 of Chapter II above shall cease to have effect five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, unless otherwise provided in the text, or unless the Council of the League of Nations shall, at least twelve months before the expiration of that period, decide that these obligations shall be maintained for a further period with or without amendment.

ARTICLE 284.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them, the International Radio-Telegraphic Convention of July 5, 1912, on condition that Germany fulfils the provisional regulations which will be indicated to her by the Allied and Associated Powers.

If within five years after the coming into force of the present Treaty a new convention regulating international radio-telegraphic communications should have been concluded to take the place of the Convention of July 5, 1912, this new convention shall bind Germany, even if Germany should refuse either to take part in drawing up the convention, or to subscribe thereto.

This new convention will likewise replace the provisional regulations in force.

ARTICLE 285.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty, the High Contracting Parties shall apply in so far as concerns them and under the conditions stipulated in Article 272, the conventions hereinafter mentioned:

(1) The Conventions of May 6, 1882, and February 1, 1889, regulating the fisheries in the North Sea outside territorial waters.

ARTICLE 287.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them, the Convention of The Hague of July 17, 1905, relating to civil procedure. This renewal, however, will not apply to France, Portugal and Roumania.

ARTICLE 288.

The special rights and privileges granted to Germany by Article 3 of the Convention of December 2, 1899, relating to Samoa shall be considered to have terminated on August 4, 1914.

ARTICLE 289.

Each of the Allied or Associated Powers, being guided by the general principles or special provisions of the present Treaty, shall notify to Germany the bilateral treaties or conventions which such Allied or Associated Power wishes to revive with Germany.

The notification referred to in the present Article shall be made either directly or through the intermediary of another Power. Receipt thereof shall be acknowledged in writing by Germany. The date of the revival shall be that of the notification.

The Allied and Associated Powers undertake among themselves not to revive with Germany any conventions or treaties which are not in accordance with the terms of the present Treaty.

The notification shall mention any provisions of the said conventions and treaties which, not being in accordance with the terms of the present Treaty, shall not be considered as revived.

In case of any difference of opinion, the League of Nations will be called on to decide.

A period of six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty is allowed to the Allied and Associated Powers within which to make the notification.

Only those bilateral treaties and conventions which have been the subject of such a notification shall be revived between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany; all the others are and shall remain abrogated.

The above regulations apply to all bilateral treaties or conventions existing between all the Allied and Associated Powers signatories to the present Treaty and Germany, even if the said Allied and Associated Powers have not been in a state of war with Germany.

ARTICLE 290.

Germany recognises that all the treaties, conventions or agreements which she has concluded with Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty are and remain abrogated by the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 291.

Germany undertakes to secure to the Allied and Associated Powers, and to the officials and nationals of the said Powers, the enjoyment of all the rights and advantages of any kind which she may have granted to Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, or to the officials and nationals of these States by treaties, conventions or arrangements concluded before August 1, 1914, so long as those treaties, conventions or arrangements remain in force.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to accept or not the enjoyment of these rights and advantages.

ARTICLE 292.

Germany recognises that all treaties, conventions or arrangements which she concluded with Russia, or with any State or Government of which the territory previously formed a part of Russia, or with Roumania, before August 1, 1914, or after that date until coming into force of the present Treaty, are and remain abrogated.

ARTICLE 293.

Should an Allied or Associated Power, Russia, or a State or Government of which the territory formerly constituted a part of Russia, have been forced since August 1, 1914, by reason of military occupation or by any other means or for any other cause, to grant or to allow to be granted by the act of any public authority, concessions, privileges and favours of any kind to Germany or to a German national, such concessions, privileges and favours are ipso facto annulled by the present Treaty.

No claims or indemnities which may result from this annulment shall be charged against the Allied or Associated Powers or the Powers, States, Governments or public authorities which are released from their engagements by the present Article.

ARTICLE 294.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty Germany undertakes to give the Allied and Associated Powers and their nationals the benefit ipso facto of the rights and advantages of any kind which she has granted by treaties, conventions, or arrangements to nonbelligerent States or their nationals since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty, so long as those treaties, conventions or arrangements remain in force.

ARTICLE 295.

Those of the High Contracting Parties who have not yet signed, or who have signed but not yet ratified, the Opium Convention signed at The Hague on January 23, 1912, agree to bring the said Convention into force, and for this purpose to enact the necessary legislation without delay and in any case within a period of twelve months from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Furthermore, they agree that ratification of the present Treaty should in the case of Powers which have not yet ratified the Opium Convention be deemed in all respects equivalent to the ratification of that Convention and to the signature of the Special Protocol which was opened at The Hague in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Third Opium Conference in 1914 for bringing the said Convention into force.

For this purpose the Government of the French Republic will communicate to the Government of the Netherlands a certified copy of the protocol of the deposit of ratifications of the present Treaty, and will invite the Government of the Netherlands to accept and deposit the said certified copy as if it were a deposit of ratifications of the Opium Convention and a signature of the Additional Protocol of 1914.

SECTION III.

DEBTS.

ARTICLE 296.

There shall be settled through the intervention of clearing offices to be established by each of the High Contracting Parties within three months of the notification referred to in paragraph (e) hereafter the following classes of pecuniary obligations:

(1) Debts payable before the war and due by a national of one of the Contracting Powers, residing within its territory, to a national of an Opposing Power, residing within its territory;

(2) Debts which became payable during the war to nationals of one Contracting Power residing within its territory and arose out of transactions or contracts with the nationals of an Opposing Power, resident within its territory, of which the total or partial execution was suspended on account of the declaration of war;

(3) Interest which has accrued due before and during the war to a national of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by an Opposing Power, provided that the payment of interest on such securities to the nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war;

(4) Capital sums which have become payable before and during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by one of the Opposing Powers, provided that the payment of such capital sums to nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war.

The proceeds of liquidation of enemy property, rights and interests mentioned in Section IV and in the Annex thereto will be accounted for through the Clearing Offices, in the currency and at the rate of exchange hereinafter provided in paragraph (d), and disposed of by them under the conditions provided by the said Section and Annex.

The settlements provided for in this Article shall be effected according to the following principles and in accordance with the Annex to this Section:

(a) Each of the High Contracting Parties shall prohibit, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, both the payment and the acceptance of payment of such debts, and also all communications between the interested parties with regard to the settlement of the said debts otherwise than through the Clearing Offices;

(b) Each of the High Contracting Parties shall be respectively responsible for the payment of such debts due by its nationals, except in the cases where before the war the debtor was in a state of bankruptcy or failure, or had given formal indication of insolvency or where the debt was due by a company whose business has been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. Nevertheless, debts due by the inhabitants of territory invaded or occupied by the enemy before the Armistice will not be guaranteed by the States of which those territories form part;

(c) The sums due to the nationals of one of the High Contracting Parties by the nationals of an Opposing State will be debited to the Clearing Office of the country of the debtor, and paid to the creditor by the Clearing Office of the country of the creditor;

(d) Debts shall be paid or credited in the currency of such one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or the British Dominions or India, as may be concerned. If the debts are payable in some other currency they shall be paid or credited in the currency of the country concerned, whether an Allied or Associated Power, Colony, Protectorate, British Dominion or India, at the pre-war rate of exchange.

For the purpose of this provision the pre-war rate of exchange shall be defined as the average cable transfer rate prevailing in the Allied or Associated country concerned during the month immediately preceding the outbreak of war between the said country concerned and Germany.

If a contract provides for a fixed rate of exchange governing the conversion of the currency in which the debt is stated into the currency of the Allied or Associated country concerned, then the above provisions concerning the rate of exchange shall not apply.

In the case of new States the currency in which and the rate of exchange at which debts shall be paid or credited shall be determined by the Reparation Commission provided for in Part VIII (Reparation);

(e) The provisions of this Article and of the Annex hereto shall not apply as between Germany on the one hand and any one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India on the other hand, unless within a period of one month from the deposit of the ratification of the present Treaty by the Power in question, or of the ratification on behalf of such Dominion or of India, notice to that effect is given to Germany by the Government of such Allied or Associated Power or of such Dominion or of India as the case may be;

(f) The Allied and Associated Powers who have adopted this Article and the Annex hereto may agree between themselves to apply them to their respective nationals established in their territory so far as regards matters between their nationals and German nationals. In this case the payments made by application of this provision will be subject to arrangements between the Allied and Associated Clearing Offices concerned.

ANNEX.

Each of the High Contracting Parties will, within three months from the notification provided for in Article 296, paragraph (e), establish a Clearing Office for the collection and payment of enemy debts.

Local Clearing Offices may be established for any particular portion of the territories of the High Contracting Parties. Such local Clearing Offices may perform all the functions of a central Clearing Office in their respective districts, except that all transactions with the Clearing Office in the Opposing State must be effected through the central Clearing Office.

In this Annex the pecuniary obligations referred to in the first paragraph of Article 296 are described "as enemy debts", the persons from whom the same are due as "enemy debtors", the persons to whom they are due as "enemy creditors", the Clearing Office in the country of the creditor is called the "Creditor Clearing Office", and the Clearing Office in the country of the debtor is called the "Debtor Clearing Office."

3.

The High Contracting Parties will subject contraventions of paragraph (a) of Article 296 to the same penalties as are at present provided by their legislation for trading with the enemy. They will similarly prohibit within their territory all legal process relating to payment of enemy debts, except in accordance with the provisions of this Annex.

The Government guarantee specified in paragraph (b) of Article 296 shall take effect whenever, for any reason, a debt shall not be recoverable, except in a case where at the date of the outbreak of war the debt was barred by the laws of prescription in force in the country of the debtor, or where the debtor was at that time in a state of bankruptcy or failure or had given formal indication of insolvency, or where the debt was due by a company whose business has been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. In such case the procedure specified by this Annex shall apply to payment of the dividends.

The terms "bankruptcy" and "failure" refer to the application of legislation providing for such juridicial conditions. The expression "formal indication of insolvency" bears the same meaning as it has in English law.

Creditors shall give notice to the Creditor Clearing Office within six months of its establishment of debts due to them, and shall furnish the Clearing Office with any documents and information required of them.

The High Contracting Parties will take all suitable measures to trace and punish collusion between enemy creditors and debtors. The Clearing Offices will communicate to one another any evidence and information which might help the discovery and punishment of such collusion.

The High Contracting Parties will facilitate as much as possible postal and telegraphic communication at the expense of the parties concerned and through the intervention of the Clearing Offices between debtors and creditors desirous of coming to an agreement as to the amount of their debt.

The Creditor Clearing Office will notify the Debtor Clearing Office of all debts declared to it. The Debtor Clearing Office will, in due course, inform the Creditor Clearing Office which debts are admitted and which debts are contested. In the latter case, the Debtor Clearing Office will give the grounds for the non-admission of debt.

When a debt has been admitted, in whole or in part, the Debtor Clearing Office will at once credit the Creditor Clearing Office with the amount admitted, and at the same time notify it of such credit.

7.

The debt shall be deemed to be admitted in full and shall be credited forthwith to the Creditor Clearing Office unless within three months from the receipt of the notification or such longer time as may be agreed to by the Creditor Clearing Office notice has been given by the Debtor Clearing Office that it is not admitted.

8.

When the whole or part of a debt is not admitted the two Clearing Offices will examine into the matter jointly and will endeavour to bring the parties to an agreement.

9.

The Creditor Clearing Office will pay to the individual creditor the sums credited to it out of the funds placed at its disposal by the Government of its country and in accordance with the conditions fixed by the said Government, retaining any sums considered necessary to cover risks, expenses or commissions.

10.

Any person having claimed payment of an enemy debt which is not admitted in whole or in part shall pay to the clearing office, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the part not admitted. Any person having unduly refused to admit the whole or part of a debt claimed from him shall pay, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the amount with regard to which his refusal shall be disallowed.

Such interest shall run from the date of expiration of the period provided for in paragraph 7 until the date on which the claim shall have been disallowed or the debt paid.

Each Clearing Office shall in so far as it is concerned take steps to collect the fines above provided for, and will be responsible if such fines cannot be collected.

The fines will be credited to the other Clearing Office, which shall retain them as a contribution towards the cost of carrying out the present provisions.

The balance between the Clearing Offices shall be struck monthly and the credit balance paid in cash by the debtor State within a week.

Nevertheless, any credit balances which may be due by one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers shall be retained until complete payment shall have been effected of the sums due to the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals on account of the war.

To facilitate discussion between the Clearing Offices each of them shall have a representative at the place where the other is established.

13.

Except for special reasons all discussions in regard to claims will, so far as possible, take place at the Debtor Clearing Office.

14.

In conformity with Article 296, paragraph (b), the High Contracting Parties are responsible for the payment of the enemy debts owing by their nationals.

The Debtor Clearing Office will therefore credit the Creditor Clearing Office with all debts admitted, even in case of inability to collect them from the individual debtor. The Governments concerned will, nevertheless, invest their respective Clearing Offices with all necessary powers for the recovery of debts which have been admitted.

As an exception, the admitted debts owing by persons having suffered injury from acts of war shall only be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office when the compensation due to the person concerned in respect of such injury shall have been paid.

Each Government will defray the expenses of the Clearing Office set up in its territory, including the salaries of the staff.

16.

Where the two Clearing Offices are unable to agree whether a debt claimed is due, or in case of a difference between an enemy debtor and an enemy creditor or between the Clearing Offices, the dispute shall either be referred to arbitration if the parties so agree under conditions fixed by agreement between them, or referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI hereafter.

At the request of the Creditor Clearing Office the dispute may, however, be submitted to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the place of domicile of the debtor.

Recovery of sums found by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, the Court, or the Arbitration Tribunal to be due shall be effected through the Clearing Offices as if these sums were debts admitted by the Debtor Clearing Office.

18.

Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint an agent who will be responsible for the presentation to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal of the cases conducted on behalf of its Clearing Office. This agent will exercise a general control over the representatives or counsel employed by its nationals.

Decisions will be arrived at on documentary evidence, but it will be open to the Tribunal to hear the parties in person, or according to their preference by their representatives approved by the two Governments, or by the agent referred to above, who shall be competent to intervene along with the party or to reopen and maintain a claim abandoned by the same.

The Clearing Offices concerned will lay before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal all the information and documents in their possession, so as to enable the Tribunal to decide rapidly on the cases which are brought before it.

20.

Where one of the parties concerned appeals against the joint decision of the two Clearing Offices he shall make a deposit against the costs, which deposit shall only be refunded when the first judgment is modified in favour of the appellant and in proportion to the success he may attain, his opponent in case of such a refund being required to pay an equivalent proportion of the costs and expenses. Security accepted by the Tribunal may be substituted for a deposit.

A fee of 5 per cent. of the amount in dispute shall be charged in respect of all cases brought before the Tribunal. This fee shall, unless the Tribunal directs otherwise, be borne by the unsuccessful party. Such fee shall be added to the deposit referred to. It is also independent of the security.

The Tribunal may award to one of the parties a sum in respect of the expenses of the proceedings.

Any sum payable under this paragraph shall be credited to the Clearing Office of the successful party as a separate item.

With a view to the rapid settlement of claims, due regard shall be paid in the appointment of all persons connected with the Clearing Offices or with the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal to their knowledge of the language of the other country concerned.

Each of the Clearing Offices will be at liberty to correspond with the other and to forward documents in its own language.

Subject to any special agreement to the contrary between the Governments concerned, debts shall carry interest in accordance with the following provisions:

Interest shall not be payable on sums of money due by way of dividend, interest or other periodical payments which themselves represent interest on capital.

The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. per annum except in cases where, by contract, law or custom, the creditor is entitled to payment of interest at a different rate. In such cases the rate to which he is entiled shall prevail.

Interest shall run from the date of commencement of hostilities (or, if the sum of money to be recovered fell due during the war, from the date at which it fell due) until the sum is credited to the Clearing Office of the creditor.

Sums due by way of interest shall be treated as debts admitted by the Clearing Offices and shall be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office in the same way as such debts.

Where by decision of the Clearing Offices or the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal a claim is held not to fall within Article 296, the creditor shall be at liberty to prosecute the claim before the Courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

The presentation of a claim to the Clearing Office suspends the operation of any period of prescription.

The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

25.

In any case where a Creditor Clearing Office declines to notify a claim to the Debtor Clearing Office, or to take any step provided for in this Annex, intended to make effective in whole or in part a request of which it has received due notice, the enemy creditor shall be entitled to receive from the Clearing Office a certificate setting out the amount of the claim, and shall then be entitled to prosecute the claim before the courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

SECTION IV.

PROPERTY, RIGHTS AND INTERESTS.

ARTICLE 297.

The question of private property, rights and interests in an enemy country shall be settled according to the principles laid down in this Section and to the provisions of the Annex hereto.

(a) The exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined in paragraph 3 of the Annex hereto) taken by Germany with respect to the property, rights and interests of nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights and interests concerned restored to their owners, who shall enjoy full rights therein in accordance with the provisions of Article 298.

(b) Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty.

The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or Associated State concerned, and the German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights or interests not to subject them to any charge without the consent of that State.

German nationals who acquire ipso facto the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power in accordance with the provisions of the present Treaty will not be considered as German nationals within the meaning of this paragraph.

(c) The price or the amount of compensation in respect of the exercise of the right referred to in the preceding paragraph (b) will be fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated.

(d) As between the Allied and Associated Powers or their nationals on the one hand and Germany or her nationals on the other hand, all the exceptional war measures, or measures of transfer, or acts done or to be done in execution of such measures as defined in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto shall be considered as final and binding upon all persons except as regards the reservations laid down in the present Treaty.

(e) The nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested, in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated, and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI or by an Arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal. This compensation shall be borne by Germany, and may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory or under the control of the claimant's State. This property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated State, and the amount will be debited to Germany.

(f) Whenever a national of an Allied or Associated Power is entitled to property which has been subjected to a measure of transfer in German territory and expresses a desire for its restitution, his claim for compensation in accordance with paragraph (e) shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property if it still exists in specie.

In such case Germany shall take all necessary steps to restore the evicted owner to the possession of his property, free from all encumbrances or burdens with which it may have been charged after the liquidation, and to indemnify all third parties injured by the restitution.

If the restitution provided for in this paragraph cannot be effected, private agreements arranged by the intermediation of the Powers concerned or the Clearing Offices provided for in the Annex to Section III may be made, in order to secure that the national of the Allied or Associated Power may secure compensation for the injury referred to in paragraph (e) by the grant of advantages or equivalents which he agrees to accept in place of the property, rights or interests of which he was deprived.

Through restitution in accordance with this Article, the price or the amount of compensation fixed by the application of paragraph (e) will be reduced by the actual value of the property restored, account being taken of compensation in respect of loss of use or deterioration.

(g) The rights conferred by paragraph (f) are reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights or interests were not applied before the signature of the Armistice.

(h) Except in cases where, by application of paragraph (f), restitutions in specie have been made, the net proceeds of sales of enemy property, rights or interests wherever situated carried out either by virtue of war legislation, or by application of this Article, and in general all cash assets of enemies, shall be dealt with as follows:

(1) As regards Powers adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the said proceeds and cash assets shall be credited to the Power of which the owner is a national, through the Clearing Office established thereunder; any credit balance in favour of Germany resulting therefrom shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243.

(2) As regards Powers not adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Germany shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government; the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of German nationals received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such Power in accordance with its laws and regulations and may be applied in payment of the claims and debts defined by this Article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. Any property, rights and interests or proceeds thereof or cash assets not used as above provided may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power and if retained the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243.

In the case of liquidations effected in new States, which are signatories of the present Treaty as Allied and Associated Powers, or in States which are not entitled to share in the reparation payments to be made by Germany, the proceeds of liquidations effected by such States shall, subject to the rights of the Reparation Commission under the present Treaty, particularly under Articles 235 and 260, be paid direct to the owner. If on the application of that owner, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, provided for by Section VI of this Part, or an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal, is satisfied that the conditions of the sale or measures taken by the Government of the State in question outside its general legislation were unfairly prejudicial to the price obtained, they shall have discretion to award to the owner equitable compensation to be paid by that State.

(i) Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights or interests in Allied or Associated States.

(j) The amount of all taxes and imposts upon capital levied or to be levied by Germany on the property, rights and interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers from November 11, 1918, until three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or, in the case of property, rights or interests which have been subjected to exceptional measures of war, until restitution in accordance with the present Treaty, shall be restored to the owners.

ARTICLE 298.

Germany undertakes, with regard to the property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they were interested, restored to nationals of Allied and Associated Powers in accordance with the provisions of Article 297, paragraph (a) or (f):

(a) to restore and maintain, except as expressly provided in the present Treaty, the property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers in the legal position obtaining in respect of the property, rights and interests of German nationals under the laws in force before the war;

(b) not to subject the property, rights or interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers to any measures in derogation of property rights which are not applied equally to the property, rights and interests of German nationals, and to pay adequate compensation in the event of the application of these measures.

ANNEX.

In accordance with the provisions of Article 297, paragraph (d), the validity of vesting orders and of orders for the winding up of businesses or companies, and of any other orders, directions, decisions or instructions of any court or any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights and interests is confirmed. The interests of all persons shall be regarded as having been effectively dealt with by any order, direction, decision or instruction dealing with property in which they may be interested, whether or not such interests are specifically mentioned in the order, direction, decision, or instruction. No question shall be raised as to the regularity of a transfer of any property, rights or interests dealt with in pursuance of any such order, direction, decision or instruction. Every action taken with regard to any property, business, or company, whether as regards its investigation, sequestration, compulsory administration, use, requisition, supervision, or winding up, the sale or management of property, rights or interests, the collection or discharge of debts, the payment of costs, charges or expenses, or any other matter whatsoever, in pursuance of orders, directions, decisions, or instructions of any court or of any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties, made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights or interests, is confirmed. Provided that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to prejudice the titles to property heretofore acquired in good faith and for value and in accordance with the laws of the country in which the property is situated by nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers.

The provisions of this paragraph do not apply to such of the above-mentioned measures as have been taken by the German authorities in invaded or occupied territory, nor to such of the above mentioned measures as have been taken by Germany or the German authorities since November 11, 1918, all of which shall be void.

No claim or action shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or Department of the Government of such a Power by Germany or by any German national wherever resident in respect of any act or omission with regard to his property, rights or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect of any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws or regulations of any Allied or Associated Power.

In Article 297 and this Annex the expression "exceptional war measures" includes measures of all kinds, legislative, administrative, judicial or others, that have been taken or will be taken hereafter with regard to enemy property, and which have had or will have the effect of removing from the proprietors the power of disposition over their property, though without affecting the ownership, such as measures of supervision, of compulsory administration, and of sequestration; or measures which have had or will have as an object the seizure of, the use of, or the interference with enemy assets, for whatsoever motive, under whatsoever form or in whatsoever place. Acts in the execution of these measures include all detentions, instructions, orders or decrees of Government departments or courts applying these measures to enemy property, as well as acts performed by any person connected with the administration or the supervision of enemy property, such as the payment of debts, the collecting of credits, the payment of any costs, charges or expenses, or the collecting of fees.

Measures of transfer are those which have affected or will affect the ownership of enemy property by transferring it in whole or in part to a person other than the enemy owner, and without his consent, such as measures directing the sale, liquidation, or devolution of ownership in enemy property, or the cancelling of titles or securities.

All property, rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealing therewith may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of other enemy Powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 297, where immediately before the outbreak of war a company incorporated in an Allied or Associated State had rights in common with a company controlled by it and incorporated in Germany to the use of trade-marks in third countries, or enjoyed the use in common with such company of unique means of reproduction of goods or articles for sale in third countries, the former company shall alone have the right to use these trade-marks in third countries to the exclusion of the German company, and these unique means of reproduction shall be handed over to the former company, notwithstanding any action taken under German war legislation with regard to the latter company or its business, industrial property or shares. Nevertheless, the former company, if requested, shall deliver the latter company derivative copies permitting the continuation of reproduction of articles for use within German territory.

6.

Up to the time when restitution is carried out in accordance with Article 297, Germany is responsible for the conservation of property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected by her to exceptional war measures.

7.

Within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Allied or Associated Powers will specify the property, rights and interests over which they intend to exercise the right provided in Article 297, paragraph (f).

8.

The restitution provided in Article 297 will be carried out by order of the German Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. Detailed accounts of the action of administrators shall be furnished to the interested persons by the German authorities upon request, which may be made at any time after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

9.

Until completion of the liquidation provided for by Article 297, paragraph (b), the property, rights and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them.

10.

Germany will, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to each Allied or Associated Power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights or interests situated in the territory of that Allied or Associated Power, including any shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that Power.

Germany will at any time on demand of any Allied or Associated Power furnish such information as may be required with regard to the property, rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of such Allied or Associated Power, or with regard to any transactions concerning such property, rights or interests effected since July 1, 1914.

The expression "cash assets" includes all deposits or funds established before or after the declaration of war, as well as all assets coming from deposits, revenues, or profits collected by administrators, sequestrators, or others from funds placed on deposit or otherwise, but does not include sums belonging to the Allied or Associated Powers or to their component States, Provinces, or Municipalities.

12.

All investments wheresoever effected with the cash assets of nationals of the High Contracting Parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any such investment.

Within one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or on demand at any time, Germany will deliver to the Allied and Associated Powers all accounts, vouchers, records, documents and information of any kind which may be within German territory, and which concern the property, rights and interests of the nationals of those Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected to an exceptional war measure, or to a measure of transfer either in German territory or in territory occupied by Germany or her allies.

The controllers, supervisors, managers, administrators, sequestrators, liquidators and receivers shall be personally responsible under guarantee of the German Government for the immediate delivery in full of these accounts and documents, and for their accuracy.

The provisions of Article 297 and this Annex relating to property, rights and interests in an enemy country, and the proceeds of the liquidation thereof, apply to debts, credits and accounts, Section III regulating only the method of payment.

In the settlement of matters provided for in Article 297 between Germany and the Allied or Associated States, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India, in respect of any of which a declaration shall not have been made that they adopt Section III, and between their respective nationals, the provisions of Section III respecting the currency in which payment is to be made and the rate of exchange and of interest shall apply unless the Government of the Allied or Associated Power concerned shall within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty notify Germany that the said provisions are not to be applied.

The provisions of Article 297 and this Annex apply to industrial, literary and artistic property which has been or will be dealt with in the liquidation of property, rights, interests, companies or businesses under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or in accordance with the stipulations of Article 297, paragraph (b).

SECTION V.

CONTRACTS, PRESCRIPTIONS, JUDGMENTS.

ARTICLE 299.

(a) Any contract concluded between enemies shall be regarded as having been dissolved as from the time when any two of the parties became enemies, except in respect of any debt or other pecuniary obligation arising out of any act done or money paid thereunder, and subject to the exceptions and special rules with regard to particular contracts or classes of contracts contained herein or in the Annex hereto.

(b) Any contract of which the execution shall be required in the general interest, within six months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, by the Allied or Associated Governments of which one of the parties is a national, shall be excepted from dissolution under this Article.

When the execution of the contract thus kept alive would, owing to the alteration of trade conditions, cause one of the parties substantial prejudice the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI shall be empowered to grant to the prejudiced party equitable compensation.

(c) Having regard to the provisions of the constitution and law of the United States of America, of Brazil, and of Japan, neither the present Article, nor Article 300, nor the Annex hereto shall apply to contracts made between nationals of these States and German nationals; nor shall Article 305 apply to the United States of America or its nationals.

(d) The present Article and the annex hereto shall not apply to contracts the parties to which became enemies by reason of one of them being an inhabitant of territory of which the sovereignty has been transferred, if such party shall acquire under the present Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, nor shall they apply to contracts between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers between whom trading has been prohibited by reason of one of the parties being in Allied or Associated territory in the occupation of the enemy.

(e) Nothing in the present Article or the annex hereto shall be deemed to invalidate a transaction lawfully carried out in accordance with a contract between enemies if it has been carried out with the authority of one of the belligerent Powers.

ARTICLE 300.

(a) All periods of prescription, or limitation of right of action, whether they began to run before or after the outbreak of war, shall be treated in the territory of the High Contracting Parties, so far as regards relations between enemies, as having been suspended for the duration of the war. They shall begin to run again at earliest three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty. This provision shall apply to the period prescribed for the presentation of interest or dividend coupons or for the presentation for repayment of securities drawn for repayment or repayable on any other ground.

(b) Where, on account of failure to perform any act or comply with any formality during the war, measures of execution have been taken in German territory to the prejudice of a national of an Allied or Associated Power, the claim of such national shall, if the matter does not fall within the competence of the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power, be heard by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI.

(c) Upon the application of any interested person who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall order the restoration of the rights which have been prejudiced by the measures of execution referred to in paragraph (b), wherever, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, such restoration is equitable and possible.

If such restoration is inequitable or impossible the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal may grant compensation to the prejudiced party to be paid by the German Government.

(d) Where a contract between enemies has been dissolved by reason either of failure on the part of either party to carry out its provisions or of the exercise of a right stipulated in the contract itself the party prejudiced may apply to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal for relief. The Tribunal will have the powers provided for in paragraph (c).

(e) The provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article shall apply to the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers who have been prejudiced by reason of measures referred to above taken by Germany in invaded or occupied territory, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

(f) Germany shall compensate any third party who may be prejudiced by any restitution or restoration ordered by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal under the provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article.

(g) As regards negotiable instruments, the period of three months provided under paragraph (a) shall commence as from the date on which any exceptional regulations applied in the territories of the interested Power with regard to negotiable instruments shall have definitely ceased to have force.

ARTICLE 301.

As between enemies no negotiable instrument made before the war shall be deemed to have become invalid by reason only of failure within the required time to present the instrument for acceptance or payment or to give notice of non-acceptance or non-payment to drawers or indorsers or to protest the instrument, nor by reason of failure to complete any formality during the war.

Where the period within which a negotiable instrument should have been presented for acceptance or for payment, or within which notice of non-acceptance or non-payment should have been given to the drawer or indorser, or within which the instrument should have been protested, has elapsed during the war, and the party who should have presented or protested the instrument or have given notice of non-acceptance or non-payment has failed to do so during the war, a period of not less than three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be allowed within which presentation, notice of non-acceptance or non-payment or protest may be made.

Judgments given by the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power in all cases, which, under the present Treaty, they are competent to decide, shall be recognised in Germany as final, and shall be enforced without it being necessary to have them declared executory.

If a judgment in respect to any dispute which may have arisen has been given during the war by a German Court against a national of an Allied or Associated State in a case in which he was not able to make his defence, the Allied and Associated national who has suffered prejudice thereby shall be entitled to recover compensation, to be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI.

At the instance of the national of the Allied or Associated Power the compensation above-mentioned may, upon order to that effect of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, be effected where it is possible by replacing the parties in the situation which they occupied before the judgment was given by the German Court.

The above compensation may likewise be obtained before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal by the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers who have suffered prejudice by judicial measures taken in invaded or occupied territories, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

ARTICLE 303.

For the purpose of Sections III, IV, V and VII, the expression "during the war" means for each Allied or Associated Power the period between the commencement of the state of war between that Power and Germany and the coming into force of the present Treaty.

ANNEX.

I. General Provisions.

1.

Within the meaning of Articles 299, 300 and 301, the parties to a contract shall be regarded as enemies when trading between them shall have been prohibited or otherwise became unlawful under laws, orders or regulations to which one of those parties was subject. They shall be deemed to have become enemies from the date when such trading was prohibited or otherwise became unlawful.

The following classes of contracts are excepted from dissolution by Article 299 and, without prejudice to the rights contained in Article 297 (b) of Section IV, remain in force subject to the application of domestic laws, orders or regulations made during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers and subject to the terms of the contracts:

(a) Contracts having for their object the transfer of estates or of real or personal property where the property therein had passed or the object had been delivered before the parties became enemies;

(b) Leases and agreements for leases of land and houses;

(c) Contracts of mortgage, pledge or lien;

(d) Concessions concerning mines, quarries or deposits;

(e) Contracts between individuals or companies and States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions, and concessions granted by States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions.

If the provisions of a contract are in part dissolved under Article 299, the remaining provisions of that contract shall, subject to the same application of domestic laws as is provided for in paragraph 2, continue in force if they are severable, but where they are not severable the contract shall be deemed to have been dissolved in its entirety.

II. Provisions relating to certain classes of Contracts.

Stock Exchange and Commercial Exchange Contracts.

4.

(a) Rules made during the war by any recognised Exchange or Commercial Association providing for the closure of contracts entered into before the war by an enemy are confirmed by the High Contracting Parties, as also any action taken thereunder, provided:

(1) That the contract was expressed to be made subject to the rules of the Exchange or Association in question;

(2) That the rules applied to all persons concerned;

(3) That the conditions attaching to the closure were fair and reasonable.

(b) The preceding paragraph shall not apply to rules made during the occupation by Exchanges or Commercial Associations in the districts occupied by the enemy.

(c) The closure of contracts relating to cotton "futures," which were closed as on July 31, 1914, under the decision of the Liverpool Cotton Association, is also confirmed, Security.

The sale of a security held for an unpaid debt owing by an enemy shall be deemed to have been valid irrespective of notice to the owner if the creditor acted in good faith and with reasonable care and prudence, and no claim by the debtor on the ground of such sale shall be admitted.

This stipulation shall not apply to any sale of securities effected by an enemy during the occupation in regions invaded or occupied by the enemy.

Negotiable Instruments.

As regards Powers which adopt Section III and the Annex thereto the pecuniary obligations existing between enemies and resulting from the issue of negotiable instruments shall be adjusted in conformity with the said Annex by the instrumentality of the Clearing Offices, which shall assume the rights of the holder as regards the various remedies open to him.

7.

If a person has either before or during the war become liable upon a negotiable instrument in accordance with an undertaking given to him by a person who has subsequently become an enemy, the latter shall remain liable to indemnify the former in respect of his liability notwithstanding the outbreak of war.

III. Contracts of Insurance.

Contracts of insurance entered into by any person with another person who subsequently became an enemy will be dealt with in accordance with the following paragraphs.

Contracts for the insurance of property against fire entered into by a person interested in such property with another person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy, or on account of the failure during the war and for a period of three months thereafter to perform his obligations under the contract, but they shall be dissolved at the date when the annual premium becomes payable for the first time after the expiration of a period of three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

A settlement shall be effected of unpaid premiums which became due during the war, or of claims for losses which occurred during the war.

Where by administrative or legislative action an insurance against fire effected before the war has been transferred during the war from the original to another insurer, the transfer will be recognised and the liability of the original insurer will be deemed to have ceased as from the date of the transfer. The original insurer will, however, be entitled to receive on demand full information as to the terms of the transfer, and if it should appear that these terms were not equitable they shall be amended so far as may be necessary to render them equitable.

Furthermore, the insured shall, subject to the concurrence of the original insurer, be entitled to retransfer the contract to the original insurer as from the date of the demand.

Life Insurance.

Contracts of life insurance entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy.

Any sum which during the war became due upon a contract deemed not to have been dissolved under the preceding provision shall be recoverable after the war with the addition of interest at five per cent. per annum from the date of its becoming due up to the day of payment.

Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums, or has become void from breach of the conditions of the contract, the assured or his representatives or the person entitled shall have the right at any time within twelve months of the coming into force of the present Treaty to claim from the insurer the surrender value of the policy at the date of its lapse or avoidance.

Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums the payment of which has been prevented by the enforcement of measures of war, the assured or his representative or the persons entitled shall have the right to restore the contract on payment of the premiums with interest at five per cent. per annum within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Any Allied or Associated Power may within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty cancel all the contracts of insurance running between a German insurance company and its nationals under conditions which shall protect its nationals from any prejudice.

To this end the German insurance company will hand over to the Allied or Associated Government concerned the proportion of its assets attributable to the policies so cancelled and will be relieved from all liability in respect of such policies. The assets to be handed over shall be determined by an actuary appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal.

Where contracts of life insurance have been entered into by a local branch of an insurance company established in a country which subsequently became an enemy country, the contract shall, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary in the contract itself, be governed by the local law, but the insurer shall be entitled to demand from the insured or his representatives the refund of sums paid on claims made or enforced under measures taken during the war, if the making or enforcement of such claims was not in accordance with the terms of the contract itself or was not consistent with the laws or treaties existing at the time when it was entered into.

14.

In any case where by the law applicable to the contract the insurer remains bound by the contract notwithstanding the non-payment of premiums until notice is given to the insured of the termination of the contract, he shall be entitled where the giving of such notice was prevented by the war to recover the unpaid premiums with interest at five per cent. per annum from the insured.

15.

Insurance contracts shall be considered as contracts of life assurance for the purpose of paragraphs 11 to 14 when they depend on the probabilities of human life combined with the rate of interest for the calculation of the reciprocal engagements between the two parties.

Contracts of marine insurance including time policies and voyage policies entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy, shall be deemed to have been dissolved on his becoming an enemy, except in cases where the risk undertaken in the contract had attached before he became an enemy.

Where the risk had not attached, money paid by way of premium or otherwise shall be recoverable from the insurer.

Where the risk had attached effect shall be given to the contract notwithstanding the party becoming an enemy, and sums due under the contract either by way of premiums or in respect of losses shall be recoverable after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

In the event of any agreement being come to for the payment of interest on sums due before the war to or by the nationals of States which have been at war and recovered after the war, such interest shall in the case of losses recoverable under contracts of marine insurance run from the expiration of a period of one year from the date of the loss.

No contract of marine insurance with an insured person who subsequently became an enemy shall be deemed to cover losses due to belligerent action by the Power of which the insurer was a national or by the allies or associates of such Power.

18.

Where it is shown that a person who had before the war entered into a contract of marine insurance with an insurer who subsequently became an enemy entered after the outbreak of war into a new contract covering the same risk with an insurer who was not an enemy, the new contract shall be deemed to be substituted for the original contract as from the date when it was entered into, and the premiums payable shall be adjusted on the basis of the original insurer having remained liable on the contract only up till the time when the new contract was entered into.

Contracts of insurance entered into before the war between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy, other than contracts dealt with in paragraphs 9 to 18, shall be treated in all respects on the same footing as contracts of fire insurance between the same persons would be dealt with under the said paragraphs.

All treaties of re-insurance with a person who became an enemy shall be regarded as having been abrogated by the person becoming an enemy, but without prejudice in the case of life or marine risks which had attached before the war to the right to recover payment after the war for sums due in respect of such risks.

Nevertheless if, owing to invasion, it has been impossible for the re-insured to find another re-insurer, the treaty shall remain in force until three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Where a re-insurance treaty becomes void under this paragraph, there shall be an adjustment of accounts between the parties in respect both of premiums paid and payable and of liabilities for losses in respect of life or marine risks which had attached before the war. In the case of risks other than those mentioned in paragraphs 11 to 18 the adjustment of accounts shall be made as at the date of the parties becoming enemies without regard to claims for losses which may have occurred since that date.

The provisions of the preceding paragraph will extend equally to re-insurances existing at the date of the parties becoming enemies of particular risks undertaken by the insurer in a contract of insurance against any risks other than life or marine risks.

22.

Re-insurance of life risks effected by particular contracts and not under any general treaty remain in force.

The provisions of paragraph 12 apply to treaties of re-insurance of life insurance contracts in which enemy companies are the re-insurers.

23.

In case of a re-insurance effected before the war of a contract of marine insurance, the cession of a risk which had been ceded to the re-insurer shall, if it had attached before the outbreak of war, remain valid and effect be given to the contract notwithstanding the outbreak of war; sums due under the contract of re-insurance in respect either of premiums or of losses shall be recoverable after the war.

24.

The provisions of paragraphs 17 and 18 and the last part of paragraph 16 shall apply to contracts for the re-insurance of marine risks.

SECTION VI.

MIXED ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL.

ARTICLE 304.

(a) Within three months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, a Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall be established between each of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Germany on the other hand. Each such Tribunal shall consist of three members. Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint one of these members. The President shall be chosen by agreement between the two Governments concerned.

In case of failure to reach agreement, the President of the Tribunal and two other persons either of whom may in case of need take his place, shall be chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, or, until this is set up, by M. Gustave Ador if he is willing. These persons shall be nationals of Powers that have remained neutral during the war.

If any Government does not proceed within a period of one month in case there is a vacancy to appoint a member of the Tribunal, such member shall be chosen by the other Government from the two persons mentioned above other than the President.

The decision of the majority of the members of the Tribunal shall be the decision of the Tribunal.

(b) The Mixed Arbitral Tribunals established pursuant to paragraph (a), shall decide all questions within their competence under Sections III, IV, V and VII.

In addition, all questions, whatsoever their nature, relating to contracts concluded before the coming into force of the present Treaty between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and German nationals shall be decided by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, always excepting questions which, under the laws of the Allied, Associated or Neutral Powers, are within the jurisdiction of the National Courts of those Powers. Such questions shall be decided by the National Courts in question, to the exclusion of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. The party who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power may nevertheless bring the case before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal if this is not prohibited by the laws of his country.

(c) If the number of cases justifies it, additional members shall be appointed and each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall sit in divisions. Each of these divisions will be constituted as above.

(d) Each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal will settle its own procedure except in so far as it is provided in the following Annex, and is empowered to award the sums to be paid by the loser in respect of the costs and expenses of the proceedings.

(e) Each Government will pay the remuneration of the member of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal appointed by it and of any agent whom it may appoint to represent it before the Tribunal. The remuneration of the President will be determined by special agreement between the Governments concerned; and this remuneration and the joint expenses of each Tribunal will be paid by the two Governments in equal moieties.

(f) The High Contracting Parties agree that their courts and authorities shall render to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals direct all the assistance in their power, particularly as regards transmitting notices and collecting evidence.

(g) The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

ANNEX.

1.

Should one of the members of the Tribunal either die, retire, or be unable for any reason whatever to discharge his function, the same procedure will be followed for filling the vacancy as was followed for appointing him.

2.

The Tribunal may adopt such rules of procedure as shall be in accordance with justice and equity and decide the order and time at which each party must conclude its arguments, and may arrange all formalities required for dealing with the evidence.

3.

The agent and counsel of the parties on each side are authorized to present orally and in writing to the Tribunal arguments in support or in defence of each case.

4.

The Tribunal shall keep record of the questions and cases submitted and the proceedings thereon, with the dates of such proceedings.

5.

Each of the Powers concerned may appoint a secretary. These secretaries shall act together as joint secretaries of the Tribunal and shall be subject to its direction. The Tribunal may appoint and employ any other necessary officer or officers to assist in the performance of its duties.

6.

The Tribunal shall decide all questions and matters submitted upon such evidence and information as may be furnished by the parties concerned.

7.

Germany agrees to give the Tribunal all facilities and information required by it for carrying out its investigations.

8.

The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall, unless otherwise agreed, be English, French, Italian or Japanese, as may be determined by the Allied or Associated Power concerned.

9.

The place and time for the meetings of each Tribunal shall be determined by the President of the Tribunal.

ARTICLE 305.

Whenever a competent court has given or gives a decision in a case covered by Sections III, IV, V or VII, and such decision is inconsistent with the provisions of such Sections, the party who is prejudiced by the decision shall be entitled to obtain redress which shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. At the request of the national of an Allied or Associated Power, the redress may, whenever possible, be effected by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal directing the replacement of the parties in the position occupied by them before the judgment was given by the German court.

SECTION VII.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY.

ARTICLE 306.

Subject to the stipulations of the present Treaty, rights of industrial, literary and artistic property, as such property is defined by the International Conventions of Paris and of Berne, mentioned in Article 286, shall be re-established or restored, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, in the territories of the High Contracting Parties, in favour of the persons entitled to the benefit of them at the moment when the state of war commenced or their legal representatives. Equally, rights which, except for the war, would have been acquired during the war in consequence of an application made for the protection of industrial property, or the publication of a literary or artistic work, shall be recognised and established in favour of those persons who would have been entitled thereto, from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Nevertheless, all acts done by virtue of the special measures taken during the war under legislative, executive or administrative authority of any Allied or Associated Power in regard to the rights of German nationals in industrial, literary or artistic property shall remain in force and shall continue to maintain their full effect.

No claim shall be made or action brought by Germany or German nationals in respect of the use during the war by the Government of any Allied or Associated Power, or by any persons acting on behalf or with the assent of such Government, of any rights in industrial, literary or artistic property, nor in respect of the sale, offering for sale, or use of any products, articles or apparatus whatsoever to which such rights applied.

Unless the legislation of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers in force at the moment of the signature of the present Treaty otherwise directs, sums due or paid in virtue of any act or operation resulting from the execution of the special measures mentioned in paragraph I of this Article shall be dealt with in the same way as other sums due to German nationals are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty; and sums produced by any special measures taken by the German Government in respect of rights in industrial, literary or artisic property belonging to the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be considered and treated in the same way as other debts due from German nationals.

Each of the Allied and Associated Powers reserves to itself the right to impose such limitations, conditions or restrictions on rights of industrial, literary or artistic property (with the exception of trade-marks) acquired before or during the war, or which may be subsequently acquired in accordance with its legislation, by German nationals, whether by granting licences, or by the working, or by preserving control over their exploitation, or in any other way, as may be considered necessary for national defence, or in the public interest, or for assuring the fair treatment by Germany of the rights of industrial, literary and artistic property held in German territory by its nationals, or for securing the due fulfilment of all the obligations undertaken by Germany in the present Treaty. As regards rights of industrial, literary and artistic property acquired after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the right so reserved by the Allied and Associated Powers shall only be exercised in cases where these limitations, conditions or restrictions may be considered necessary for national defence or in the public interest.

In the event of the application of the provisions of the preceding paragraph by any Allied or Associated Power, there shall be paid reasonable indemnities or royalties, which shall be dealt with in the same way other sums due to German nationals are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty.

Each of the Allied or Associated Powers reserves the right to treat as void and of no effect any transfer in whole or in part of or other dealing with rights of or in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property effected after August 1, 1914, or in the future, which would have the result of defeating the objects of the provisions of this Article.

The provisions of this Article shall not apply to rights in industrial, literary or artistic property which have been dealt with in the liquidation of businesses or companies under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or which may be so dealt with by virtue of Article 297, paragraph (b).

ARTICLE 307.

A minimum of one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be accorded to the nationals of the High Contracting Parties, without extension fees or other penalty, in order to enable such persons to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, pay any fees, and generally satisfy any obligation prescribed by the laws or regulations of the respective States relating to the obtaining, preserving, or opposing rights to, or in respect of, industrial property either acquired before August 1, 1914, or which, except for the war, might have been acquired since that date as a result of an application made before the war or during its continuance, but nothing in this Article shall give any right to reopen interference proceedings in the United States of America where a final hearing has taken place.

All rights in, or in respect of, such property which may have lapsed by reason of any failure to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, or make any payment, shall revive, but subject in the case of patents and designs to the imposition of such conditions as each Allied or Associated Power may deem reasonably necessary for the protection of persons who have manufactured or made use of the subject matter of such property while the rights had lapsed. Further, where rights to patents or designs belonging to German nationals are revived under this Article, they shall be subject in respect of the grant of licences to the same provisions as would have been applicable to them during the war, as well as to all the provisions of the present Treaty.

The period from August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be excluded in considering the time within which a patent should be worked or a trade mark or design used, and it is further agreed that no patent, registered trade mark or design in force on August 1, 1914, shall be subject to revocation or cancellation by reason only of the failure to work such patent or use such trade mark or design for two years after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 308.

The rights of priority, provided by Article 4 of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of Paris, of March 20, 1883, revised at Washington in 1911 or by any other Convention or Statute, for the filing or registration of applications for patents or models of utility, and for the registration of trade marks, designs and models which had not expired on August 1, 1914, and those which have arisen during the war, or would have arisen but for the war, shall be extended by each of the High Contracting Parties in favour of all nationals of the other High Contracting Parties for a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Nevertheless, such extension shall in no way affect the right of any of the High Contracting Parties or of any person who before the coming into force of the present Treaty was bonâ fide in possession of any rights of industrial property conflicting with rights applied for by another who claims rights of priority in respect of them, to exercise such rights by itself or himself personally, or by such agents or licensees as derived their rights from it or him before the coming into force of the present Treaty; and such persons shall not be amenable to any action or other process of law in respect of infringement.

ARTICLE 309.

No action shall be brought and no claim made by persons residing or carrying on business within the territories of Germany on the one part and of the Allied or Associated Powers on the other, or persons who are nationals of such Powers respectively, or by any one deriving title during the war from such persons, by reason of any action which has taken place within the territory of the other party between the date of the declaration of war and that of the coming into force of the present Treaty, which might constitute an infringement of the rights of industrial property or rights of literary and artistic property, either existing at any time during the war or revived under the provisions of Articles 307 and 308.

Equally, no action for infringement of industrial, literary or artistic property rights by such persons shall at any time be permissible in respect of the sale or offering for sale for a period of one year after the signature of the present Treaty in the territories of the Allied or Associated Powers on the one hand or Germany on the other, of products or articles manufactured, or of literary or artistic works published, during the period between the declaration of war and the signature of the present Treaty, or against those who have acquired and continue to use them. It is understood, nevertheless, that this provision shall not apply when the possessor of the rights was domiciled or had an industrial or commercial establishment in the districts occupied by Germany during the war.

This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Germany on the other.

ARTICLE 310.

Licences in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property concluded before the war between nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers or persons residing in their territory or carrying on business therein, on the one part, and German nationals, on the other part, shall be considered as cancelled as from the date of the declaration of war between Germany and the Allied or Associated Powers. But, in any case, the former beneficiary of a contract of this kind shall have the right, within a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, to demand from the proprietor of the rights the grant of a new licence, the conditions of which, in default of agreement between the parties, shall be fixed by the duly qualified tribunal in the country under whose legislation the rights had been acquired, except in the case of licences held in respect of rights acquired under German law. In such cases the conditions shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal referred to in Section VI of this Part. The tribunal may, if necessary, fix also the amount which it may deem just should be paid by reason of the use of the rights during the war.

No licence in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property, granted under the special war legislation of any Allied or Associated Power, shall be affected by the continued existence of any licence entered into before the war, but shall remain valid and of full effect, and a licence so granted to the former beneficiary of a licence entered into before the war shall be considered as substituted for such licence.

Where sums have been paid during the war by virtue of a licence or agreement concluded before the war in respect of rights of industrial property or for the reproduction or the representation of literary, dramatic or artistic works, these sums shall be dealt with in the same manner as other debts or credits of German nationals, as provided by the present Treaty.

This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Germany on the other.

ARTICLE 311.

The inhabitants of territories separated from Germany by virtue of the present Treaty shall, notwithstanding this separation and the change of nationality consequent thereon, continue to enjoy in Germany all the rights in industrial, literary and artistic property to which they were entitled under German legislation at the time of the separation.

Rights of industrial, literary and artistic property which are in force in the territories separated from Germany under the present Treaty at the moment of the separation of these territories from Germany, or which will be re-established or restored in accordance with the provisions of Article 306 of the present Treaty, shall be recognized by the State to which the said territory is transferred and shall remain in force in that territory for the same period of time given them under the German law.

SECTION VIII.

SOCIAL AND STATE INSURANCE IN CEDED TERRITORY.

ARTICLE 312.

Without prejudice to the provisions contained in other Articles of the present Treaty, the German Government undertakes to transfer to any Power to which German territory in Europe is ceded, and to any Power administering former German territory as a mandatory under Article 22 of Part I (League of Nations), such portion of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German States, or by public or private organisations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of Social or State Insurance in such territory.

The Powers to which these funds are transferred must apply them to the performance of the obligations arising from such insurances.

The conditions of the transfer will be determined by special conventions to be concluded between the German Government and the Governments concerned.

In case these special conventions are not concluded in accordance with the above paragraph within three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the conditions of transfer shall in each case be referred to a Commission of five members, one of whom shall be appointed by the German Government, one by the other interested Government and three by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office from the nationals of other States. This Commission shall by majority vote within three months after appointment adopt recommendations for submission to the Council of the League of Nations, and the decisions of the Council shall forthwith be accepted as final by Germany and the other Government concerned.

PART XI.

AERIAL NAVIGATION.

ARTICLE 313.

The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall have full liberty of passage and landing over and in the territory and territorial waters of Germany, and shall enjoy the same privileges as German aircraft, particularly in case of distress by land or sea.

ARTICLE 314.

The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall, while in transit to any foreign country whatever, enjoy the right of flying over the territory and territorial waters of Germany without landing, subject always to any regulations which may be made by Germany, and which shall be applicable equally to the aircraft of Germany and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

ARTICLE 315.

All aerodromes in Germany open to national public traffic shall be open for the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers, and in any such aerodrome such aircraft shall be treated on a footing of equality with German aircraft as regards charges of every description, including charges for landing and accommodation.

ARTICLE 316.

Subject to the present provisions, the rights of passage, transit and landing, provided for in Articles 313, 314 and 315, are subject to the observance of such regulations as Germany may consider it necessary to enact, but such regulations shall be applied without distinction to German aircraft and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

ARTICLE 317.

Certificates of nationality, airworthiness, or competency, and licences, issued or recognised as valid by any of the Allied or Associated Powers, shall be recognised in Germany as valid and as equivalent to the certificates and licences issued by Germany.

ARTICLE 318.

As regards internal commercial air traffic, the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Germany most favoured nation treatment.

ARTICLE 319.

Germany undertakes to enforce the necessary measures to ensure that all German aircraft flying over her territory shall comply with the Rules as to lights and signals, Rules of the Air and Rules for Air Traffic on and in the neighbourhood of aerodromes, which have been laid down in the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers.

ARTICLE 320.

The obligations imposed by the preceding provisions shall remain in force until January 1, 1923, unless before that date Germany shall have been admitted into the League of Nations or shall have been authorised, by consent of the Allied and Associated Powers, to adhere to the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between those Powers.

PART XII.

PORTS, WATERWAYS AND RAILWAYS.

SECTION I.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 321.

Germany undertakes to grant freedom of transit through her territories on the routes most convenient for international transit, either by rail, navigable waterway, or canal, to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails coming from or going to the territories of any of the Allied and Associated Powers (whether contiguous or not); for this purpose the crossing of territorial waters shall be allowed. Such persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails shall not be subjected to any transit duty or to any undue delays or restrictions, and shall be entitled in Germany to national treatment as regards charges, facilities, and all other matters.

Goods in transit shall be exempt from all Customs or other similar duties.

All charges imposed on transport in transit shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic. No charge, facility or restriction shall depend directly or indirectly on the ownership or on the nationality of the ship or other means of transport on which any part of the through journey has been, or is to be, accomplished.

ARTICLE 322.

Germany undertakes neither to impose nor to maintain any control over transmigration traffic through her territories beyond measures necessary to ensure that passengers are bonâ fide in transit; nor to allow any shipping company or any other private body, corporation or person interested in the traffic to take any part whatever in, or to exercise any direct or indirect influence over, any administrative service that may be necessary for this purpose.

ARTICLE 323.

Germany undertakes to make no discrimination or preference, direct or indirect, in the duties, charges and prohibitions relating to importations into or exportations from her territories, or, subject to the special engagements contained in the present Treaty, in the charges and conditions of transport of goods or persons entering or leaving her territories, based on the frontier crossed; or on the kind, ownership or flag of the means of transport (including aircraft) employed; or on the original or immediate place of departure of the vessel, wagon or aircraft or other means of transport employed, or its ultimate or intermediate destination; or on the route of or places of transshipment on the journey; or on whether any port through which the goods are imported or exported is a German port or a port belonging to any foreign country or on whether the goods are imported or exported by sea, by land or by air.

Germany particularly undertakes not to establish against the ports and vessels of any of the Allied and Associated Powers any surtax or any direct or indirect bounty for export or import by German ports or vessels, or by those of another Power, for example by means of combined tariffs. She further undertakes that persons or goods passing through a port or using a vessel of any of the Allied and Associated Powers shall not be subjected to any formality or delay whatever to which such persons or goods would not be subjected if they passed through a German port or a port of any other Power, or used a German vessel or a vessel of any other Power.

ARTICLE 324.

All necessary administrative and technical measures shall be taken to shorten, as much as possible, the transmission of goods across the German frontiers and to ensure their forwarding and transport from such frontiers, irrespective of whether such goods are coming from or going to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers or are in transit from or to those territories, under the same material conditions in such matters as rapidity of carriage and care en route as are enjoyed by other goods of the same kind carried on German territory under similar conditions of transport.

In particular, the transport of perishable goods shall be promptly and regularly carried out, and the customs formalities shall be effected in such a way as to allow the goods to be carried straight through by trains which make connection.

ARTICLE 325.

The seaports of the Allied and Associated Powers are entitled to all favours and to all reduced tariffs granted on German railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of German ports or of any port of another Power.

ARTICLE 326.

Germany may not refuse to participate in the tariffs or combinations of tariffs intended to secure for ports of any of the Allied and Associated Powers advantages similar to those granted by Germany to her own ports or the ports of any other Power.

SECTION II.

NAVIGATION.

CHAPTER I.

FREEDOM OF NAVIGATION.

ARTICLE 327.

The nationals of any of the Allied and Associated Powers as well as their vessels and property shall enjoy in all German ports and on the inland navigation routes of Germany the same treatment in all respects as German nationals, vessels and property.

In particular the vessels of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be entitled to transport goods of any description, and passengers, to or from any ports or places in German territory to which German vessels may have access, under conditions which shall not be more onerous than those applied in the case of national vessels; they shall be treated on a footing of equality with national vessels as regards port and harbour facilities and charges of every description, including facilities for stationing, loading and unloading, and duties and charges of tonnage, harbour, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, and all analogous duties and charges of whatsoever nature, levied in the name of or for the profit of the Government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind.

In the event of Germany granting a preferential régime to any of the Allied or Associated Powers or to any other foreign Power, this régime shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to all the Allied and Associated Powers.

There shall be no impediment to the movement of persons or vessels other than those arising from prescriptions concerning customs, police, sanitation, emigration and immigration, and those relating to the import and export of prohibited goods. Such regulations must be reasonable and uniform and must not impede traffic unnecessarily.

CHAPTER II.

FREE ZONES IN PORTS.

ARTICLE 328.

The free zones existing in German ports on August 1, 1914, shall be maintained. These free zones, and any other free zones which may be established in German territory by the present Treaty, shall be subject to the régime provided for in the following Articles.

Goods entering or leaving a free zone shall not be subjected to any import or export duty, other than those provided for in Article 330.

Vessels and goods entering a free zone may be subjected to the charges established to cover expenses of administration, upkeep and improvement of the port, as well as to the charges for the use of various installations, provided that these charges shall be reasonable having regard to the expenditure incurred, and shall be levied in the conditions of equality provided for in Article 327.

Goods shall not be subjected to any other charges except a statistical duty which shall not exceed 1 per mille ad valorem, and which shall be devoted exclusively to defraying the expenses of compiling statements of the traffic in the port.

ARTICLE 329.

The facilities granted for the erection of warehouses, for packing and for unpacking goods, shall be in accordance with trade requirements for the time being. All goods allowed to be consumed in the free zone shall be exempt from duty, whether of excise or of any other description, apart from the statistical duty provided for in Article 328 above.

There shall be no discrimination in regard to any of the provisions of the present Article between persons belonging to different nationalities or between goods of different origin or destination.

ARTICLE 330.

Import duties may be levied on goods leaving the free zone for consumption in the country on the territory of which the port is situated. Conversely, export duties may be levied on goods coming from such country and brought into the free zone. These import and export duties shall be levied on the same basis and at the same rates as similar duties levied at the other Customs frontiers of the country concerned. On the other hand, Germany shall not levy, under any denomination, any import, export or transit duty on goods carried by land or water across her territory to or from the free zone from or to any other State.

Germany shall draw up the necessary regulations to secure and guarantee such freedom of transit over such railways and waterways in her territory as normally give access to the free zone.

CHAPTER III.

CLAUSES RELATING TO THE ELBE, THE ODER, THE NIEMEN (RUSSSTROM-MEMEL-NIEMEN) AND THE DANUBE.

(I)—General Clauses.

ARTICLE 331.

The following rivers are declared international:

the Elbe (Labe) from its confluence with the Vltava (Moldau), and the Vltava (Moldau) from Prague;
the Oder (Odra) from its confluence with the Oppa;
the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) from Grodno;
the Danube from Ulm;

and all navigable parts of these river systems which naturally provide more than one State with access to the sea, with or without transshipment from one vessel to another; together with lateral canals and channels constructed either to duplicate or to improve naturally navigable sections of the specified river systems, or to connect two naturally navigable sections of the same river.

The same shall apply to the Rhine-Danube navigable waterway, should such a waterway be constructed under the conditions laid down in Article 353.

ARTICLE 332.

On the waterways declared to be international in the preceding Article, the nationals, property and flags of all Powers shall be treated on a footing of perfect equality, no distinction being made to the detriment of the nationals, property or flag of any Power between them and the nationals, property or flag of the riparian State itself or of the most favoured nation.

Nevertheless, German vessels shall not be entitled to carry passengers or goods by regular services between the ports of any Allied or Associated Power, without special authority from such Power.

ARTICLE 333.

Where such charges are not precluded by any existing conventions, charges varying on different sections of a river may be levied on vessels using the navigable channels or their approaches, provided that they are intended solely to cover equitably the cost of maintaining in a navigable condition, or of improving, the river and its approaches, or to meet expenditure incurred in the interests of navigation. The schedule of such charges shall be calculated on the basis of such expenditure and shall be posted up in the ports. These charges shall be levied in such a manner as to render any detailed examination of cargoes unnecessary, except in cases of suspected fraud or contravention.

ARTICLE 334.

The transit of vessels, passengers and goods on these waterways shall be effected in accordance with the general conditions prescribed for transit in Section I above.

When the two banks of an international river are within the same State goods in transit may be placed under seal or in the custody of customs agents. When the river forms a frontier goods and passengers in transit shall be exempt from all customs formalities; the loading and unloading of goods, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, shall only take place in the ports specified by the riparian State.

ARTICLE 335.

No dues of any kind other than those provided for in the present Part shall be levied along the course or at the mouth of these rivers.

This provision shall not prevent the fixing by the riparian States of customs, local octroi or consumption duties, or the creation of reasonable and uniform charges levied in the ports, in accordance with public tariffs, for the use of cranes, elevators, quays, warehouses, etc.

ARTICLE 336.

In default of any special organisation for carrying out the works connected with the upkeep and improvement of the international portion of a navigable system, each riparian State shall be bound to take suitable measures to remove any obstacle or danger to navigation and to ensure the maintenance of good conditions of navigation.

If a State neglects to comply with this obligation any riparian State, or any State represented on the International Commission, if there is one, may appeal to the tribunal instituted for this purpose by the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 337.

The same procedure shall be followed in the case of a riparian State undertaking any works of a nature to impede navigation in the international section. The tribunal mentioned in the preceding Article shall be entitled to enforce the suspension or suppression of such works, making due allowance in its decisions for all rights in connection with irrigation, waterpower, fisheries, and other national interests, which, with the consent of all the riparian States or of all the States represented on the International Commission, if there is one, shall be given priority over the requirements of navigation.

Appeal to the tribunal of the League of Nations does not require the suspension of the works.

ARTICLE 338.

The régime set out in Articles 332 to 337 above shall be superseded by one to be laid down in a General Convention drawn up by the Allied and Associated Powers, and approved by the League of Nations, relating to the waterways recognised in such Convention as having an international character. This Convention shall apply in particular to the whole or part of the above-mentioned river systems of the Elbe (Labe), the Oder (Odra), the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen), and the Danube, and such other parts of these river systems as may be covered by a general definition.

Germany undertakes, in accordance with the provisions of Article 379, to adhere to the said General Convention as well as to all projects prepared in accordance with Article 343 below for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations.

ARTICLE 339.

Germany shall cede to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned, within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given her, a proportion of the tugs and vessels remaining registered in the ports of the river systems referred to in Article 331 after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation. Germany shall in the same way cede material of all kinds necessary to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned for the utilisation of those river systems.

The number of the tugs and boats, and the amount of the material so ceded, and their distribution, shall be determined by an arbitrator or arbitrators nominated by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned, and particularly to the shipping traffic during the five years preceding the war.

All craft so ceded shall be provided with their fittings and gear, shall be in a good state of repair and in condition to carry goods, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

The cessions provided for in the present Article shall entail a credit of which the total amount, settled in a lump sum by the arbitrator or arbitrators, shall not in any case exceed the value of the capital expended in the initial establishment of the material ceded, and shall be set off against the total sums due from Germany; in consequence, the indemnification of the proprietors shall be a matter for Germany to deal with.

(2) Special Clauses relating to the Elbe, the Oder and the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen).

ARTICLE 340.

The Elbe (Labe) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission which shall comprise:

4 representatives of the German States bordering on the river;
2 representatives of the Czecho-Slovak State;
1 representative of Great Britain;
1 representative of France;
1 representative of Italy;
1 representative of Belgium.

Whatever be the number of members present, each delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it.

If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

ARTICLE 341.

The Oder (Odra) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission, which shall comprise:

1 representative of Poland;
3 representatives of Prussia;
1 representative of the Czecho-Slovak State;
1 representative of Great Britain;
1 representative of France;
1 representative of Denmark;
1 representative of Sweden.

If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

ARTICLE 342.

On a request being made to the League of Nations by any riparian State, the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission, which shall comprise one representative of each riparian State, and three representatives of other States specified by the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 343.

The International Commissions referred to in Articles 340 and 341 shall meet within three months of the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty. The International Commission referred to in Article 342 shall meet within three months from the date of the request made by a riparian State. Each of these Commissions shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of the existing international agreements and regulations, drawn up in conformity with the General Convention referred to in Article 338, should such Convention have been already concluded. In the absence of such Convention, the project for revision shall be in conformity with the principles of Articles 332 to 337 above.

ARTICLE 344.

The projects referred to in the preceding Article shall, inter alia:

(a) designate the headquarters of the International Commission, and prescribe the manner in which its President is to be nominated;

(b) specify the extent of the Commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and improvement on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges, and regulations for navigation;

(c) define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied.

ARTICLE 345.

The international agreements and regulations at present governing the navigation of the Elbe (Labe), the Oder (Odra), and the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be provisionally maintained in force until the ratification of the above-mentioned projects. Nevertheless, in all cases where such agreements and regulations in force are in conflict with the provisions of Articles 332 to 337 above, or of the General Convention to be concluded, the latter provisions shall prevail.

(3) Special Clauses relating to the Danube.

ARTICLE 346.

The European Commission of the Danube reassumes the powers it possessed before the war. Nevertheless, as a provisional measure, only representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy and Roumania shall constitute this Commission.

ARTICLE 347.

From the point where the competence of the European Commission ceases, the Danube system referred to in Article 331 shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission composed as follows:

2 representatives of German riparian States;
1 representative of each other riparian State;
1 representative of each non-riparian State represented in the future on the European Commission of the Danube.

If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

ARTICLE 348.

The International Commission provided for in the preceding Article shall meet as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and shall undertake provisionally the administration of the river in conformity with the provisions of Articles 332 to 337, until such time as a definitive statute regarding the Danube is concluded by the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers.

ARTICLE 349.

Germany agrees to accept the régime which shall be laid down for the Danube by a Conference of the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers, which shall meet within one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and at which German representatives may be present.

ARTICLE 350.

The mandate given by Article 57 of the Treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, to Austria-Hungary, and transferred by her to Hungary, to carry out works at the Iron Gates, is abrogated. The Commission entrusted with the administration of this part of the river shall lay down provisions for the settlement of accounts subject to the financial provisions of the present Treaty. Charges which may be necessary shall in no case be levied by Hungary.

ARTICLE 351.

Should the Czecho-Slovak State, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State or Roumania with the authorisation of or under mandate from the International Commission, undertake maintenance, improvement, weir, or other works on a part of the river system which forms a frontier, these States shall enjoy on the opposite bank, and also on the part of the bed which is outside their territory, all necessary facilities for the survey, execution and maintenance of such works.

ARTICLE 352.

Germany shall be obliged to make to the European Commission of the Danube all restitutions, reparations and indemnities for damages inflicted on the Commission during the war.

ARTICLE 353.

Should a deep-draught Rhine-Danube navigable waterway be constructed, Germany undertakes to apply thereto the régime prescribed in Articles 332 to 338.

CHAPTER IV.

CLAUSES RELATING TO THE RHINE AND THE MOSELLE.

ARTICLE 354.

As from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Convention of Mannheim of October 17, 1868, together with the Final Protocol thereof, shall continue to govern navigation on the Rhine, subject to the conditions hereinafter laid down.

In the event of any provisions of the said Convention being in conflict with those laid down by the General Convention referred to in Article 338 (which shall apply to the Rhine) the provisions of the General Convention shall prevail.

Within a maximum period of six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Central Commission referred to in Article 355 shall meet to draw up a project of revision of the Convention of Mannheim. This project shall be drawn up in harmony with the provisions of the General Convention referred to above, should this have been concluded by that time, and shall be submitted to the Powers represented on the Central Commission. Germany hereby agrees to adhere to the project so drawn up.

Further, the modifications set out in the following Articles shall immediately be made in the Convention of Mannheim.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve to themselves the right to arrive at an understanding in this connection with Holland, and Germany hereby agrees to accede if required to any such understanding.

ARTICLE 355.

The Central Commission provided for in the Convention of Mannheim shall consist of nineteen members, viz:

2 representatives of the Netherlands;
2 representatives of Switzerland;
4 representatives of German riparian States;
4 representatives of France, which in addition shall appoint the President of the Commission;
2 representatives of Great Britain;
2 representatives of Italy;
2 representatives of Belgium.

The headquarters of the Central Commission shall be at Strasburg.

Whatever be the number of members present, each Delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it.

If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

ARTICLE 356.

Vessels of all nations, and their cargoes, shall have the same rights and privileges as those which are granted to vessels belonging to the Rhine navigation, and to their cargoes.

None of the provisions contained in Articles 15 to 20 and 26 of the above-mentioned Convention of Mannheim, in Article 4 of the Final Protocol thereof, or in later Conventions, shall impede the free navigation of vessels and crews of all nations on the Rhine and on waterways to which such Conventions apply, subject to compliance with the regulations concerning pilotage and other police measures drawn up by the Central Commission.

The provisions of Article 22 of the Convention of Mannheim and of Article 5 of the Final Protocol thereof shall be applied only to vessels registered on the Rhine. The Central Commission shall decide on the steps to be taken to ensure that other vessels satisfy the conditions of the general regulations applying to navigation on the Rhine.

ARTICLE 357.

Within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given Germany shall cede to France tugs and vessels, from among those remaining registered in German Rhine ports after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation, or shares in German Rhine navigation companies.

When vessels and tugs are ceded, such vessels and tugs, together with their fittings and gear, shall be in good state of repair, shall be in condition to carry on commercial traffic on the Rhine, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

The same procedure shall be followed in the matter of the cession by Germany to France of:

(1) the installations, berthing and anchorage accommodation, platforms, docks, warehouses, plant, etc., which German subjects or German companies owned on August 1, 1914, in the port of Rotterdam, and

(2) the shares or interests which Germany or German nationals possessed in such installations at the same date.

The amount and specifications of such cessions shall be determined within one year of the coming into force of the present Treaty by an arbitrator or arbitrators appointed by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned.

The cessions provided for in the present Article shall entail a credit of which the total amount, settled in a lump sum by the arbitrator or arbitrators mentioned above, shall not in any case exceed the value of the capital expended in the initial establishment of the ceded material and installations, and shall be set off against the total sums due from Germany; in consequence, the indemnification of the proprietors shall be a matter for Germany to deal with.

ARTICLE 358.

Subject to the obligation to comply with the provisions of the Convention of Mannheim or of the Convention which may be substituted therefor, and to the stipulations of the present Treaty, France shall have on the whole course of the Rhine included between the two extreme points of the French frontiers:

(a) the right to take water from the Rhine to feed navigation and irrigation canals (constructed or to be constructed) or for any other purpose, and to execute on the German bank all works necessary for the exercise of this right;

(b) the exclusive right to the power derived from works of regulation on the river, subject to the payment to Germany of the value of half the power actually produced, this payment, which will take into account the cost of the works necessary for producing the power, being made either in money or in power and in default of agreement being determined by arbitration. For this purpose France alone shall have the right to carry out in this part of the river all works of regulation (weirs or other works) which she may consider necessary for the production of power. Similarly, the right of taking water from the Rhine is accorded to Belgium to feed the Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway provided for below.

The exercise of the rights mentioned under (a) and (b) of the present Article shall not interfere with navigability nor reduce the facilities for navigation, either in the bed of the Rhine or in the derivations which may be substituted therefor, nor shall it involve any increase in the tolls formerly levied under the Convention in force. All proposed schemes shall be laid before the Central Commission in order that that Commission may assure itself that these conditions are complied with.

To ensure the proper and faithful execution of the provisions contained in (a) and (b) above, Germany:

(1) binds herself not to undertake or to allow the construction of any lateral canal or any derivation on the right bank of the river opposite the French frontiers;

(2) recognises the possession by France of the right of support on and the right of way over all lands situated on the right bank which may be required in order to survey, to build, and to operate weirs which France, with the consent of the Central Commission, may subsequently decide to establish. In accordance with such consent, France shall be entitled to decide upon and fix the limits of the necessary sites, and she shall be permitted to occupy such lands after a period of two months after simple notification, subject to the payment by her to Germany of indemnities of which the total amount shall be fixed by the Central Commission. Germany shall make it her business to indemnify the proprietors whose property will be burdened with such servitudes or permanently occupied by the works.

Should Switzerland so demand, and if the Central Commission approves, the same rights shall be accorded to Switzerland for the part of the river forming her frontier with other riparian States;

(3) shall hand over to the French Government, during the month following the coming into force of the present Treaty, all projects, designs, drafts of concessions and of specifications concerning the regulation of the Rhine for any purpose whatever which have been drawn up or received by the Governments of Alsace-Lorraine or of the Grand Duchy of Baden.

ARTICLE 359.

Subject to the preceding provisions, no works shall be carried out in the bed or on either bank of the Rhine where it forms the boundary of France and Germany without the previous approval of the Central Commission or of its agents.

ARTICLE 360.

France reserves the option of substituting herself as regards the rights and obligations resulting from agreements arrived at between the Government of Alsace-Lorraine and the Grand Duchy of Baden concerning the works to be carried out on the Rhine; she may also denounce such agreements within a term of five years dating from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

France shall also have the option of causing works to be carried out which may be recognised as necessary by the Central Commission for the upkeep or improvement of the navigability of the Rhine above Mannheim.

ARTICLE 361.

Should Belgium within a period of 25 years from the coming into force of the present Treaty decide to create a deep-draught Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway, in the region of Ruhrort, Germany shall be bound to construct, in accordance with plans to be communicated to her by the Belgian Government, after agreement with the Central Commission, the portion of this navigable waterway situated within her territory.

The Belgian Government shall, for this purpose, have the right to carry out on the ground all necessary surveys.

Should Germany fail to carry out all or part of these works, the Central Commission shall be entitled to carry them out instead; and, for this purpose, the Commission may decide upon and fix the limits of the necessary sites and occupy the ground after a period of two months after simple notification, subject to the payment of indemnities to be fixed by it and paid by Germany.

This navigable waterway shall be placed under the same administrative régime as the Rhine itself, and the division of the cost of initial construction, including the above indemnities, among the States crossed thereby shall be made by the Central Commission.

ARTICLE 362.

Germany hereby agrees to offer no objection to any proposals of the Central Rhine Commission for extending its jurisdiction:

(1) to the Moselle below the Franco-Luxemburg frontier down to the Rhine, subject to the consent of Luxemburg;

(2) to the Rhine above Basle up to the Lake of Constance, subject to the consent of Switzerland;

(3) to the lateral canals and channels which may be established either to duplicate or to improve naturally navigable sections of the Rhine or the Moselle, or to connect two naturally navigable sections of these rivers, and also any other parts of the Rhine river system which may be covered by the General Convention provided for in Article 338 above.

CHAPTER V.

CLAUSES GIVING TO THE CZECHO-SLOVAK STATE THE USE OF NORTHERN PORTS.

ARTICLE 363.

In the ports of Hamburg and Stettin Germany shall lease to the Czecho-Slovak State, for a period of 99 years, areas which shall be placed under the general régime of free zones and shall be used for the direct transit of goods coming from or going to that State.

ARTICLE 364.

The delimitation of these areas, and their equipment, their exploitation, and in general all conditions for their utilisation, including the amount of the rental, shall be decided by a Commission consisting of one delegate of Germany, one delegate of the Czecho-Slovak State and one delegate of Great Britain. These conditions shall be susceptible of revision every ten years in the same manner.

Germany declares in advance that she will adhere to the decisions so taken.

SECTION III.

RAILWAYS.

CHAPTER I.

CLAUSES RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT.

ARTICLE 365.

Goods coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, and going to Germany, or in transit through Germany from or to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, shall enjoy on the German railways as regards charges to be collected (rebates and drawbacks being taken into account), facilities, and all other matters, the most favourable treatment applied to goods of the same kind carried on any German lines, either in internal traffic, or for export, import or in transit, under similar conditions of transport, for example as regards length of route. The same rule shall be applied, on the request of one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers, to goods specially designated by such Power or Powers coming from Germany and going to their territories.

International tariffs established in accordance with the rates referred to in the preceding paragraph and involving through waybills shall be established when one of the Allied and Associated Powers shall require it from Germany.

ARTICLE 366.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall renew, in so far as concerns them and under the reserves indicated in the second paragraph of the present Article, the conventions and arrangements signed at Berne on October 14, 1890, September 20, 1893, July 16, 1895, June 16, 1898, and September 19, 1906, regarding the transportation of goods by rail.

If within five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty a new convention for the transportation of passengers, luggage and goods by rail shall have been concluded to replace the Berne Convention of October 14, 1890, and the subsequent additions referred to above, this new convention and the supplementary provisions for international transport by rail which may be based on it shall bind Germany, even if she shall have refused to take part in the preparation of the convention or to subscribe to it. Until a new convention shall have been concluded, Germany shall conform to the provisions of the Berne Convention and the subsequent additions referred to above, and to the current supplementary provisions.

ARTICLE 367.

Germany shall be bound to co-operate in the establishment of through ticket services (for passengers and their luggage) which shall be required by any of the Allied and Associated Powers to ensure their communication by rail with each other and with all other countries by transit across the territories of Germany; in particular Germany shall, for this purpose, accept trains and carriages coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers and shall forward them with a speed at least equal to that of her best long-distance trains on the same lines. The rates applicable to such through services shall not in any case be higher than the rates collected on German internal services for the same distance, under the same conditions of speed and comfort.

The tariffs applicable under the same conditions of speed and comfort to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from ports of the Allied and Associated Powers and using the German railways shall not be at a higher kilometric rate than the most favourable tariffs (drawbacks and rebates being taken into account) enjoyed on the said railways by emigrants going to or coming from any other ports.

ARTICLE 368.

Germany shall not apply specially to such through services, or to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers, any technical, fiscal or administrative measures, such as measures of customs examination, general police, sanitary police, and control, the result of which would be to impede or delay such services.

ARTICLE 369.

In case of transport partly by rail and partly by internal navigation, with or without through waybill, the preceding Articles shall apply to the part of the journey performed by rail.

CHAPTER II.

ROLLING-STOCK.

ARTICLE 370.

Germany undertakes that German wagons shall be fitted with apparatus allowing:

(1) of their inclusion in goods trains on the lines of such of the Allied and Associated Powers as are parties to the Berne Convention of May 15, 1886, as modified on May 18, 1907, without hampering the action of the continuous brake which may be adopted in such countries within ten years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and

(2) of the acceptance of wagons of such countries in all goods trains on the German lines.

The rolling-stock of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy on the German lines the same treatment as German rolling-stock as regards movement, upkeep and repairs.

CHAPTER III.

CESSIONS OF RAILWAY LINES.

ARTICLE 371.

Subject to any special provisions concerning the cession of ports, waterways and railways situated in the territories over which Germany abandons her sovereignty, and to the financial conditions relating to the concessionnaires and the pensioning of the personnel, the cession of railways will take place under the following conditions:

(1) The works and installations of all the railroads shall be handed over complete and in good condition.

(2) When a railway system possessing its own rolling-stock is handed over in its entirety by Germany to one of the Allied and Associated Powers, such stock shall be handed over complete, in accordance with the last inventory before November 11, 1918, and in a normal state of upkeep.

(3) As regards lines without any special rolling-stock, Commissions of experts designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany shall be represented, shall fix the proportion of the stock existing on the system to which those lines belong to be handed over. These Commissions shall have regard to the amount of the material registered on these lines in the last inventory before November 11, 1918, the length of track (sidings included), and the nature and amount of the traffic. These Commissions shall also specify the locomotives, carriages and wagons to be handed over in each case; they shall decide upon the conditions of their acceptance, and shall make the provisional arrangements necessary to ensure their repair in German workshops.

(4) Stocks of stores, fittings and plant shall be handed over under the same conditions as the rolling-stock.

The provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 above shall be applied to the lines of former Russian Poland converted by Germany to the German gauge, such lines being regarded as detached from the Prussian State System.

CHAPTER IV.

PROVISIONS RELATING TO CERTAIN RAILWAY LINES.

ARTICLE 372.

When as a result of the fixing of new frontiers a railway connection between two parts of the same country crosses another country, or a branch line from one country has its terminus in another, the conditions of working, if not specifically provided for in the present Treaty, shall be laid down in a convention between the railway administrations concerned. If the administrations cannot come to an agreement as to the terms of such convention, the points of difference shall be decided by commissions of experts composed as provided in the preceding Article.

ARTICLE 373.

Within a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Czecho-Slovak State may require the construction of a railway line in German territory between the stations of Schlauney and Nachod. The cost of construction shall be borne by the Czecho-Slovak State.

ARTICLE 374.

Germany undertakes to accept, within ten years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, on request being made by the Swiss Government after agreement with the Italian Government, the denunciation of the International Convention of October 13, 1909, relative to the St. Gothard railway. In the absence of agreement as to the conditions of such denunciation, Germany hereby agrees to accept the decision of an arbitrator designated by the United States of America.

CHAPTER V.

TRANSITORY PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 375.

Germany shall carry out the instructions given her, in regard to transport, by an authorised body acting on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers:

(1) For the carriage of troops under the provisions of the present Treaty, and of material, ammunition and supplies for army use;

(2) As a temporary measure, for the transportation of supplies for certain regions, as well as for the restoration, as rapidly as possible, of the normal conditions of transport, and for the organisation of postal and telegraphic services.

SECTION IV.

DISPUTES.

AND REVISION OF PERMANENT CLAUSES.

ARTICLE 376.

Disputes which may arise between interested Powers with regard to the interpretation and application of the preceding Articles shall be settled as provided by the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 377.

At any time the League of Nations may recommend the revision of such of these Articles as relate to a permanent administrative régime.

ARTICLE 378.

The stipulations in Articles 321 to 330, 332, 365, and 367 to 369 shall be subject to revision by the Council of the League of Nations at any time after five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Failing such revision, no Allied or Associated Power can claim after the expiration of the above period of five years the benefit of any of the stipulations in the Articles enumerated above on behalf of any portion of its territories in which reciprocity is not accorded in respect of such stipulations. The period of five years during which reciprocity cannot be demanded may be prolonged by the Council of the League of Nations.

SECTION V.

SPECIAL PROVISION.

ARTICLE 379.

Without prejudice to the special obligations imposed on her by the present Treaty for the benefit of the Allied and Associated Powers, Germany undertakes to adhere to any General Conventions regarding the international régime of transit, waterways, ports or railways which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers, with the approval of the League of Nations, within five years of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

SECTION VI.

CAUSES RELATING TO THE KIEL CANAL.

ARTICLE 380.

The Kiel Canal and its approaches shall be maintained free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality.

ARTICLE 381.

The nationals, property and vessels of all Powers shall, in respect of charges, facilities, and in all other respects, be treated on a footing of perfect equality in the use of the Canal, no distinction being made to the detriment of nationals, property and vessels of any Power between them and the nationals, property and vessels of Germany or of the most favoured nation.

No impediment shall be placed on the movement of persons or vessels other than those arising out of police, customs, sanitary, emigration or immigration regulations and those relating to the import or export of prohibited goods. Such regulations must be reasonable and uniform and must not unnecessarily impede traffic.

ARTICLE 382.

Only such charges may be levied on vessels using the Canal or its approaches as are intended to cover in an equitable manner the cost of maintaining in a navigable condition, or of improving, the Canal or its approaches, or to meet expenses incurred in the interests of navigation. The schedule of such charges shall be calculated on the basis of such expenses, and shall be posted up in the ports.

These charges shall be levied in such a manner as to render any detailed examination of cargoes unnecessary, except in the case of suspected fraud or contravention.

ARTICLE 383.

Goods in transit may be placed under seal or in the custody of customs agents; the loading and unloading of goods, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, shall only take place in the ports specified by Germany.

ARTICLE 384.

No charges of any kind other than those provided for in the present Treaty shall be levied along the course or at the approaches of the Kiel Canal.

ARTICLE 385.

Germany shall be bound to take suitable measures to remove any obstacle or danger to navigation, and to ensure the maintenance of good conditions of navigation. She shall not undertake any works of a nature to impede navigation on the Canal or its approaches.

ARTICLE 386.

In the event of violation of any of the conditions of Articles 380 to 386, or of disputes as to the interpretation of these Articles, any interested Power can appeal to the jurisdiction instituted for the purpose by the League of Nations.

In order to avoid reference of small questions to the League of Nations, Germany will establish a local authority at Kiel qualified to deal with disputes in the first instance and to give satisfaction so far as possible to complaints which may be presented through the consular representatives of the interested Powers.

PART XIII.

LABOUR.

SECTION I.

ORGANISATION OF LABOUR.

Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required: as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organisation of vocational and technical education and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

CHAPTER I.

ORGANISATION.

ARTICLE 387.

A permanent organisation is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the Preamble.

The original Members of the League of Nations shall be the original Members of this organisation, and hereafter membership of the League of Nations shall carry with it membership of the said organisation.

ARTICLE 388.

The permanent organisation shall consist of:

(1) a General Conference of Representatives of the Members and,

(2) an International Labour Office controlled by the Governing Body described in Article 393.

ARTICLE 389.

The meetings of the General Conference of Representatives of the Members shall be held from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once in every year. It shall be composed of four Representatives of each of the Members, of whom two shall be Government Delegates and the two others shall be Delegates representing respectively the employers and the workpeople of each of the Members.

Each Delegate may be accompanied by advisers, who shall not exceed two in number for each item on the agenda of the meeting. When questions specially affecting women are to be considered by the Conference, one at least of the advisers should be a woman.

The Members undertake to nominate non-Government Delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organisations, if such organisations exist, which are most representative of employers or workpeople, as the case may be, in their respective countries.

Advisers shall not speak except on a request made by the Delegate whom they accompany and by the special authorization of the President of the Conference, and may not vote.

A Delegate may by notice in writing addressed to the President appoint one of his advisers to act as his deputy, and the adviser, while so acting, shall be allowed to speak and vote.

The names of the Delegates and their advisers will be communicated to the International Labour Office by the Government of each of the Members.

The credentials of Delegates and their advisers shall be subject to scrutiny by the Conference, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, refuse to admit any Delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this Article.

ARTICLE 390.

Every Delegate shall be entitled to vote individually on all matters which are taken into consideration by the Conference.

If one of the Members fails to nominate one of the non-Government Delegates whom it is entitled to nominate, the other non-Government Delegate shall be allowed to sit and speak at the Conference, but not to vote.

If in accordance with Article 389 the Conference refuses admission to a Delegate of one of the Members, the provisions of the present Article shall apply as if that Delegate had not been nominated.

ARTICLE 391.

The meetings of the Conference shall be held at the seat of the League of Nations, or at such other place as may be decided by the Conference at a previous meeting by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

ARTICLE 392.

The International Labour Office shall be established at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organisation of the League.

ARTICLE 393.

The International Labour Office shall be under the control of a Governing Body consisting of twenty-four persons, appointed in accordance with the following provisions:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall be constituted as follows:

Twelve persons representing the Governments;

Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the employers;

Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the workers.

Of the twelve persons representing the Governments eight shall be nominated by the Members which are of the chief industrial importance, and four shall be nominated by the Members selected for the purpose by the Government Delegates to the Conference, excluding the Delegates of the eight Members mentioned above.

Any question as to which are the Members of the chief industrial importance shall be decided by the Council of the League of Nations.

The period of office of the Members of the Governing Body will be three years. The method of filling vacancies and other similar questions may be determined by the Governing Body subject to the approval of the Conference.

The Governing Body shall, from time to time, elect one of its members to act as its Chairman, shall regulate its own procedure and shall fix its own times of meeting. A special meeting shall be held if a written request to that effect is made by at least ten members of the Governing Body.

ARTICLE 394.

There shall be a Director of the International Labour Office, who shall be appointed by the Governing Body, and, subject to the instructions of the Governing Body, shall be responsible for the efficient conduct of the International Labour Office and for such other duties as may be assigned to him.

The Director or his deputy shall attend all meetings of the Governing Body.

ARTICLE 395.

The staff of the International Labour Office shall be appointed by the Director, who shall, so far as is possible with due regard to the efficiency of the work of the Office, select persons of different nationalities. A certain number of these persons shall be women.

ARTICLE 396.

The functions of the International Labour Office shall include the collection and distribution of information on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions of industrial life and labour, and particularly the examination of subjects which it is proposed to bring before the Conference with a view to the conclusion of international conventions, and the conduct of such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference.

It will prepare the agenda for the meetings of the Conference.

It will carry out the duties required of it by the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty in connection with international disputes.

It will edit and publish in French and English, and in such other languages as the Governing Body may think desirable, a periodical paper dealing with problems of industry and employment of international interest.

Generally, in addition to the functions set out in this Article, it shall have such other powers and duties as may be assigned to it by the Conference.

ARTICLE 397.

The Government Departments of any of the Members which deal with questions of industry and employment may communicate directly with the Director through the Representative of their Government on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, or failing any such Representative, through such other qualified official as the Government may nominate for the purpose.

ARTICLE 398.

The International Labour Office shall be entitled to the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations in any matter in which it can be given.

ARTICLE 399.

Each of the Members will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of its Delegates and their advisers and of its Representatives attending the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body, as the case may be.

All the other expenses of the International Labour Office and of the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body shall be paid to the Director by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations out of the general funds of the League.

The Director shall be responsible to the Secretary-General of the League for the proper expenditure of all moneys paid to him in pursuance of this Article.

CHAPTER II.

PROCEDURE.

ARTICLE 400.

The agenda for all meetings of the Conference will be settled by the Governing Body, who shall consider any suggestion as to the agenda that may be made by the Government of any of the Members or by any representative organisation recognised for the purpose of Article 389.

ARTICLE 401.

The Director shall act as the Secretary of the Conference, and shall transmit the agenda so as to reach the Members four months before the meeting of the Conference, and, through them, the non-Government Delegates when appointed.

ARTICLE 402.

Any of the Governments of the Members may formally object to the inclusion of any item or items in the agenda. The grounds for such objection shall be set forth in a reasoned statement addressed to the Director, who shall circulate it to all the Members of the Permanent Organisation.

Items to which such objection has been made shall not, however, be excluded from the agenda, if at the Conference a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present is in favour of considering them.

If the Conference decides (otherwise than under the preceding paragraph) by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present that any subject shall be considered by the Conference, that subject shall be included in the agenda for the following meeting.

ARTICLE 403.

The Conference shall regulate its own procedure, shall elect its own President, and may appoint committees to consider and report on any matter.

Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Part of the present Treaty, all matters shall be decided by a simple majority of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

The voting is void unless the total number of votes cast is equal to half the number of the Delegates attending the Conference.

ARTICLE 404.

The Conference may add to any committees which it appoints technical experts, who shall be assessors without power to vote.

ARTICLE 405.

When the Conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the Conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form: (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the Members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the Members.

In either case a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of the recommendation or draft convention, as the case may be, by the Conference.

In framing any recommendation or draft convention of general application the Conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organisation or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.

A copy of the recommendation or draft convention shall be authenticated by the signature of the President of the Conference and of the Director and shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General will communicate a certified copy of the recommendation or draft convention to each of the Members.

Each of the Members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

In the case of a recommendation, the Members will inform the Secretary-General of the action taken.

In the case of a draft convention, the Member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the Member.

In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this Article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

The above Article shall be interpreted in accordance with the following principle:

In no case shall any Member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the Conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

ARTICLE 406.

Any convention so ratified shall be registered by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, but shall only be binding upon the Members which ratify it.

ARTICLE 407.

If any convention coming before the Conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, it shall nevertheless be within the right of any of the Members of the Permanent Organisation to agree to such convention among themselves.

Any convention so agreed to shall be communicated by the Governments concerned to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall register it.

ARTICLE 408.

Each of the Members agrees to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of conventions to which it is a party. These reports shall be made in such form and shall contain such particulars as the Governing Body may request. The Director shall lay a summary of these reports before the next meeting of the Conference.

ARTICLE 409.

In the event of any representation being made to the International Labour Office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the Members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the Governing Body may communicate this representation to the Government against which it is made and may invite that Government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

ARTICLE 410.

If no statement is received within a reasonable time from the Government in question, or if the statement when received is not deemed to be satisfactory by the Governing Body, the latter shall have the right to publish the representation and the statement, if any, made in reply to it.

ARTICLE 411.

Any of the Members shall have the right to file a complaint with the International Labour Office if it is not satisfied that any other Member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance for the foregoing Articles.

The Governing Body may, if it thinks fit, before referring such a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry, as hereinafter provided for, communicate with the Government in question in the manner described in Article 409.

If the Governing Body does not think it necessary to communicate the complaint to the Government in question, or if, when they have made such communication, no statement in reply has been received within a reasonable time which the Governing Body considers to be satisfactory, the Governing Body may apply for the appointment of a Commission of Enquiry to consider the complaint and to report thereon.

The Governing Body may adopt the same procedure either of its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from a Delegate to the Conference.

When any matter arising out of Articles 410 or 411 is being considered by the Governing Body, the Government in question shall, if not already represented thereon, be entitled to send a representative to take part in the procceedings of the Governing Body while the matter is under consideration. Adequate notice of the date on which the matter will be considered shall be given to the Government in question.

ARTICLE 412.

The Commission of Enquiry shall be constituted in accordance with the following provisions:

Each of the Members agrees to nominate within six months of the date on which the present Treaty comes into force three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative of workers, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the Members of the Commission of Enquiry shall be drawn.

The qualifications of the persons so nominated shall be subject to scrutiny by the Governing Body, which may by two-thirds of the votes cast by the representatives present refuse to accept the nomination of any person whose qualifications do not in its opinion comply with the requirements of the present Article.

Upon the application of the Governing Body, the Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall nominate three persons, one from each section of this panel, to constitute the Commission of Enquiry, and shall designate one of them as the President of the Commission. None of these three persons shall be a person nominated to the panel by any Member directly concerned in the complaint.

ARTICLE 413.

The Members agree that, in the event of the reference of a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry under Article 411, they will each, whether directly concerned in the complaint or not, place at the disposal of the Commission all the information in their possession which bears upon the subject-matter of the complaint.

ARTICLE 414.

When the Commission of Enquiry has fully considered the complaint, it shall prepare a report embodying its findings on all questions of fact relevant to determining the issue between the parties and containing such recommendations as it may think proper as to the steps which should be taken to meet the complaint and the time within which they should be taken.

It shall also indicate in this report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other Governments would be justified in adopting.

ARTICLE 415.

The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall communicate the report of the Commission of Enquiry to each of the Governments concerned in the complaint, and shall cause it to be published.

Each of these Governments shall within one month inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations whether or not it accepts the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission; and if not, whether it proposes to refer the complaint to the Permanent Court of International Justice of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 416.

In the event of any Member failing to take the action required by Article 405, with regard to a recommendation or draft Convention, any other Member shall be entitled to refer the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

ARTICLE 417.

The decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice in regard to a complaint or matter which has been referred to it in pursuance of Article 415 or Article 416 shall be final.

ARTICLE 418.

The Permanent Court of International Justice may affirm, vary or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry, if any, and shall in its decision indicate the measures, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate, and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government.

ARTICLE 419.

In the event of any Member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the Commission of Enquiry, or in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, any other Member may take against that Member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the Commission or in the decision of the Court as appropriate to the case.

ARTICLE 420.

The defaulting Government may at any time inform the Governing Body that it has taken the steps necessary to comply with the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry or with those in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, and may request it to apply to the Secretary-General of the League to constitute a Commission of Enquiry to verify its contention. In this case the provisions of Articles 412, 413, 414, 415, 417 and 418 shall apply, and if the report of the Commission of Enquiry or the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice is in favour of the defaulting Government, the other Governments shall forthwith discontinue the measures of an economic character that they have taken against the defaulting Government.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 421.

The Members engage to apply conventions which they have ratified in accordance with the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty to their colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing:

(1) Except where owing to the local conditions the convention is inapplicable, or

(2) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt the convention to local conditions.

And each of the Members shall notify to the International Labour Office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

ARTICLE 422.

Amendments to this Part of the present Treaty which are adopted by the Conference by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present shall take effect when ratified by the States whose representatives compose the Council of the League of Nations and by three-fourths of the Members.

ARTICLE 423.

Any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of this Part of the present Treaty or of any subsequent convention concluded by the Members in pursuance of the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty shall be referred for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

CHAPTER IV.

The first meeting of the Conference shall take place in October, 1919. The place and agenda for this meeting shall be as specified in the Annex hereto.

Arrangements for the convening and the organisation of the first meeting of the Conference will be made by the Government designated for the purpose in the said Annex. That Government shall be assisted in the preparation of the documents for submission to the Conference by an International Committee constituted as provided in the said Annex.

The expenses of the first meeting and of all subsequent meetings held before the League of Nations has been able to establish a general fund, other than the expenses of Delegates and their advisers, will be borne by the Members in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

ARTICLE 425.

Until the League of Nations has been constituted all communications which under the provisions of the foregoing Articles should be addressed to the Secretary-General of the League will be preserved by the Director of the International Labour Office, who will transmit them to the Secretary-General of the League.

ARTICLE 426.

Pending the creation of a Permanent Court of International Justice disputes which in accordance with this Part of the present Treaty would be submitted to it for decision will be referred to a tribunal of three persons appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

SECTION II.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

ARTICLE 427.

The High Contracting Parties, recognising that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in Section I and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognise that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the High Contracting Parties to be of special and urgent importance:

First.—The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second.—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third.—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth.—The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth.—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth.—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh.—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth.—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth.—Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the High Contracting Parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the League, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage-earners of the world.

PART XIV.

GUARANTEES.

SECTION 1.

WESTERN EUROPE.

ARTICLE 428.

As a guarantee for the execution of the present Treaty by Germany, the German territory situated to the west of the Rhine, together with the bridgeheads, will be occupied by Allied and Associated troops for a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 429.

If the conditions of the present Treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany, the occupation referred to in Article 428 will be successively restricted as follows:

(1) At the expiration of five years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Cologne and the territories north of a line running along the Ruhr, then along the railway Jülich, Duren, Euskirchen, Rheinbach, thence along the road Rheinbach to Sinzig, and reaching the Rhine at the confluence with the Ahr; the roads, railways and places mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

(2) At the expiration of ten years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Coblenz and the territories north of a line to be drawn from the intersection between the frontiers of Belgium, Germany and Holland, running about from 4 kilometres south of Aix la-Chapelle, then to and following the crest of Forst Gemünd, then east of the railway of the Urft Valley, then along Blankenheim, Valdorf, Dreis, Ulmen to and following the Moselle from Bremm to Nehren, then passing by Kappel and Simmern, then following the ridge of the heights between Simmern and the Rhine and reaching this river at Bacharach; all the places, valleys, roads and railways mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

(3) At the expiration of fifteen years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Mainz, the bridgehead of Kehl and the remainder of the German territory under occupation.

If at that date the guarantees against unprovoked aggression by Germany are not considered sufficient by the Allied and Associated Governments, the evacuation of the occupying troops may be delayed to the extent regarded as necessary for the purpose of obtaining the required guarantees.

ARTICLE 430.

In case either during the occupation or after the expiration of the fifteen years referred to above the Reparation Commission finds that Germany refuses to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present Treaty with regard to reparation, the whole or part of the areas specified in Article 429 will be re-occupied immediately by the Allied and Associated forces.

ARTICLE 431.

If before the expiration of the period of fifteen years Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present Treaty, the occupying forces will be withdrawn immediately.

ARTICLE 432.

All matters relating to the occupation and not provided for by the present Treaty shall be regulated by subsequent agreements, which Germany hereby undertakes to observe.

SECTION II.

EASTERN EUROPE.

ARTICLE 433.

As a guarantee for the execution of the provisions of the present Treaty, by which Germany accepts definitely the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, and of all treaties, conventions and agreements entered into by her with the Maximalist Government in Russia, and in order to ensure the restoration of peace and good government in the Baltic Provinces and Lithuania, all German troops at present in the said territories shall return to within the frontiers of Germany as soon as the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers shall think the moment suitable, having regard to the internal situation of these territories. These troops shall abstain from all requisitions and seizures and from any other coercive measures, with a view to obtaining supplies intended for Germany, and shall in no way interfere with such measures for national defence as may be adopted by the Provisional Governments of Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania.

No other German troops shall, pending the evacuation or after the evacuation is complete, be admitted to the said territories.

PART XV.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 434.

Germany undertakes to recognise the full force of the Treaties of Peace and Additional Conventions which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of Germany and to recognise whatever dispositions may be made concerning the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, of the Kingdom of Bulgaria and of the Ottoman Empire, and to recognize the new States within their frontiers as there laid down.

ARTICLE 435.

The High Contracting Parties, while they recognize the guarantees stipulated by the Treaties of 1815, and especially by the Act of November 20, 1815, in favour of Switzerland, the said guarantees constituting international obligations for the maintenance of peace, declare nevertheless that the provisions of these treaties, conventions, declarations and other supplementary Acts concerning the neutralized zone of Savoy, as laid down in paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna and in paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815, are no longer consistent with present conditions. For this reason the High Contracting Parties take note of the agreement reached between the French Government and the Swiss Government for the abrogation of the stipulations relating to this zone which are and remain abrogated.

The High Contracting Parties also agree that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and of the other supplementary Acts concerning the free zones of Upper Savoy and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions, and that it is for France and Switzerland to come to an agreement together with a view to settling between themselves the status of these territories under such conditions as shall be considered suitable by both countries.

ANNEX.

I.

The Swiss Federal Council has informed the French Government on May 5, 1919, that after examining the provisions of Article 435 in a like spirit of sincere friendship it has happily reached the conclusion that it was possible to acquiesce in it under the following conditions and reservations:

(1) The neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie:

(a) It will be understood that as long as the Federal Chambers have not ratified the agreement come to between the two Governments concerning the abrogation of the stipulations in respect of the neutralized zone of Savoy, nothing will be definitively settled, on one side or the other, in regard to this subject.

(b) The assent given by the Swiss Government to the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations presupposes, in conformity with the text adopted, the recognition of the guarantees formulated in favour of Switzerland by the Treaties of 1815 and particularly by the Declaration of November 20, 1815.

(c) The agreement between the Governments of France and Switzerland for the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations will only be considered as valid if the Treaty of Peace contains this Article in its present wording. In addition the Parties to the Treaty of Peace should endeavour to obtain the assent of the signatory Powers of the Treaties of 1815 and of the Declaration of November 20, 1815, which are not signatories of the present Treaty of Peace.

(2) Free zone of Haute-Savoie and the district of Gex:

(a) The Federal Council makes the most express reservations to the interpretation to be given to the statement mentioned in the last paragraph of the above Article for insertion in the Treaty of Peace, which provides that "the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts concerning the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions." The Federal Council would not wish that its acceptance of the above wording should lead to the conclusion that it would agree to the suppression of a system intended to give neighbouring territory the benefit of a special régime which is appropriate to the geographical and economical situation and which has been well tested.

In the opinion of the Federal Council the question is not the modification of the customs system of the zones as set up by the Treaties mentioned above, but only the regulation in a manner more appropriate to the economic conditions of the present day of the terms of the exchange of goods between the regions in question. The Federal Council has been led to make the preceding observations by the perusal of the draft Convention concerning the future constitution of the zones which was annexed to the note of April 26 from the French Government. While making the above reservations the Federal Council declares its readiness to examine in the most friendly spirit any proposals which the French Government may deem it convenient to make on the subject.

(b) It is conceded that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts relative to the free zones will remain in force until a new arrangement is come to between France and Switzerland to regulate matters in this territory.

II.

The French Government have addressed to the Swiss Government, on May 18, 1919, the following note in reply to the communication set out in the preceding paragraph:

In a note dated May 5 the Swiss Legation in Paris was good enough to inform the Government of the French Republic that the Federal Government adhered to the proposed Article to be inserted in the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Governments and Germany.

The French Government have taken note with much pleasure of the agreement thus reached, and, at their request, the proposed Article, which had been accepted by the Allied and Associated Governments, has been inserted under No. 435 in the Peace conditions presented to the German Plenipotentiaries.

The Swiss Government, in their note of May 5 on this subject, have expressed various views and reservations.

Concerning the observations relating to the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district, the French Government have the honour to observe that the provisions of the last paragraph of Article 435 are so clear that their purport cannot be misapprehended, especially where it implies that no other Power but France and Switzerland will in future be interested in that question.

The French Government, on their part, are anxious to protect the interests of the French territories concerned, and, with that object, having their special situation in view, they bear in mind the desirability of assuring them a suitable customs régime and determining, in a manner better suited to present conditions, the methods of exchanges between these territories and the adjacent Swiss territories, while taking into account the reciprocal interests of both regions.

It is understood that this must in no way prejudice the right of France to adjust her customs line in this region in conformity with her political frontier, as is done on the other portions of her territorial boundaries, and as was done by Switzerland long ago on her own boundaries in this region.

The French Government are pleased to note on this subject in what a friendly disposition the Swiss Government take this opportunity of declaring their willingness to consider any French proposal dealing with the system to be substituted for the present régime of the said free zones, which the French Government intend to formulate in the same friendly spirit.

Moreover, the French Government have no doubt that the provisional maintenance of the régime of 1815 as to the free zones referred to in the above mentioned paragraph of the note from the Swiss Legation of May 5, whose object is to provide for the passage from the present régime to the conventional régime, will cause no delay whatsoever in the establishment of the new situation which has been found necessary by the two Governments. This remark applies also to the ratification by the Federal Chambers, dealt with in paragraph 1 (a), of the Swiss note of May 5, under the heading "Neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie."

ARTICLE 436.

The High Contracting Parties declare and place on record that they have taken note of the Treaty signed by the Government of the French Republic on July 17, 1918, with His Serene Highness the Prince of Monaco defining the relations between France and the Principality.

ARTICLE 437.

The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of a subsequent agreement to the contrary, the Chairman of any Commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote.

ARTICLE 438.

The Allied and Associated Powers agree that where Christian religious missions were being maintained by German societies or persons in territory belonging to them, or of which the government is entrusted to them in accordance with the present Treaty, the property which these missions or missionary societies possessed, including that of trading societies whose profits were devoted to the support of missions, shall continue to be devoted to missionary purposes. In order to ensure the due execution of this undertaking the Allied and Associated Governments will hand over such property to boards of trustees appointed by or approved by the Governments and composed of persons holding the faith of the Mission whose property is involved.

The Allied and Associated Governments, while continuing to maintain full control as to the individuals by whom the Missions are conducted, will safeguard the interests of such Missions.

Germany, taking note of the above undertaking, agrees to accept all arrangements made or to be made by the Allied or Associated Government concerned for carrying on the work of the said missions or trading societies and waives all claims on their behalf.

ARTICLE 439.

Without prejudice to the provisions of the present Treaty, Germany undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any Allied or Associated Power, signatory of the present Treaty, including those which without having declared war, have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest.

ARTICLE 440.

Germany accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German shops and goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, and undertakes not to put forward any claim arising out of such decrees or orders on behalf of any German national.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to examine in such manner as they may determine all decisions and orders of German Prize Courts, whether affecting the property rights of nationals of those Powers or of neutral Powers. Germany agrees to furnish copies of all the documents constituting the record of the cases, including the decisions and orders made, and to accept and give effect to the recommendations made after such examination of the cases.

THE PRESENT TREATY, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall be ratified.

The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris as soon as possible.

Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the Treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand, and by three of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès-verbal the Treaty will come into force between the High Contracting Parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present Treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the Treaty.

In all other respects the Treaty will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbaux of the deposit of ratifications.

IN FAITH WHEREOF the above-named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty.

Done at Versailles, the twenty-eighth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the Signatory Powers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the treaty submitted by the President of the United States be printed, in both languages, for the use of the Senate, together with the maps.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a concurrent resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone, and without maps, 10,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 40,000 for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask the Senator to include in his request that the address delivering the treaty be printed with it.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be better to have them printed as separate documents. I was going to move the printing of the address.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I will wait for that to be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the address of the President of the United States be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I have to say is that an equal number should be printed, if possible. One is a request for unanimous consent and the other is a concurrent resolution. I have no objection at all to the printing within the $500 limit, as provided by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope there will not be any $500 limit upon this printing.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, there can not be upon the treaty, and there must not be upon the message. I asked for unanimous consent for both, and it was given, as I understood.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I ask for order in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope that these copies of the treaty that are for general distribution will be printed, not in RECORD type but in good large type, so that they can be easily read. I am aware, of course, that the $500 limit applies to both the address and the treaty; but I think we ought to pass these orders at once, because there will be a very great demand both for the address and the treaty, and the Senate ought to have it as soon as possible for distribution.

Mr. SMOOT. Such an order is contrary to law.

Mr. PITTMAN's order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the address of the President of the United States, delivered in the Senate Chamber this day, be printed as a Senate document and that 50,000 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as a matter of law, the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House are directed, every Congress, to assemble and furnish to the Congress in compact form all the figures and laws pertaining to appropriations, with a list of the offices discontinued, if any; the new offices created, if any, and the salaries of each class; all increases, decreases, and omissions of salaries; contracts requiring future payments, and so forth, and so forth.

At the close of each session the committee is expected to place before the Senate and in the RECORD figures showing the amount of appropriations for the current year and those provided for the ensuing year.

The reason why this was not done at the end of the last Congress is obvious, as we were in some confusion and seven or eight of the large appropriation bills providing for 1920 were at the time of adjournment unacted upon. In consequence of this some inaccurate statements have been indulged in, both in speech and in print. Now that those appropriation bills of the Sixty-fifth Congress have been completed in the present Congress, the committee takes the earliest practicable opportunity to present the facts for record.

I present for the RECORD four tables. The first one shows the appropriations for 1919. I mention only the totals. The grand total of those appropriations is $27,092,094,720.75. Of course, that includes the $3,000,000,000 loaned to our Allies during that year and all the appropriations inclusive, the regular, deficiency, miscellaneous, and permanent appropriations.

Like appropriations just completed for 1920 amount to $7,337,597,283.58, a decrease in 1920 from 1919 amounting to $19,754,497,437.17.

I submit next a table which shows the figures of the eight large appropriation bills which have been passed up to this time during the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, with some analysis of the miscellaneous, permanent, indefinite, and deficiency appropriations, the figures being the same as the first. I also present a table showing, first, what was in the unfinished bills as far as they had reached when we adjourned March 4; second, what was asked for by the departments since in the way of estimates; and third, what we really appropriated, those totals, omitting the smaller figures, being about two and three-fourths of a billion dollars agreed upon, as against four and a half billion dollars asked for, and to which we appropriated but $1,685,867,893.64.

I submit still another table which shows the amounts sought to be appropriated by the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, the eight bills left over, unacted upon, and the amounts later passed in these same bills in the present session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, with the difference. The difference amounts to $939,692,541.97, that being the amount less in the eight bills as passed by the Sixty-sixth Congress than the amount carried in the old bills which failed to pass when the Sixty-fifth Congress closed. I ask that these tables be printed in the RECORD.

The tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 10, 1919.

The House met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let the light of Thy countenance, our God and our Father, shine upon us, and let Thy counsels prevail in the minds and hearts of the lawmakers of a great Nation, that in the pursuits of peace our people with all the peoples of the world may prosper in everything that makes for larger life and happiness, and thus distribute among us and all peoples a broader, fuller common sense, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name and to the good of Thy children everywhere. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POINT OF NO QUORUM.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DRANE was granted leave of absence, for three days, on account of important business.

PROPOSED TIME OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman hold his request for a moment for me to ask unanimous consent? I want to ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that we have lost so much time to-day upon the prohibition bill, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, so we may go on with debate on the prohibition bill and get to a final vote within at least the next two weeks.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

POINT OF NO QUORUM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and obviously there is not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Under the special order for to-day, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has leave to address the House for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, it has long been a custom at the end of each session of Congress to review the appropriations made at that session. When, however, the Sixty-fifth Congress came to an end on the 4th day of last March it was found that eight of the great supply bills had failed. Consequently no statement could be made as to the aggregate of the appropriations granted at that session. The failure of the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress to pass the Agricultural appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the Indian appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, the Sundry Civil appropriation bill, the appropriation for the Railroad Administration, and the third deficiency appropriation, made it absolutely necessary for the President to convene Congress in extraordinary session; otherwise, the Sixty-sixth Congress would not have convened until the 1st day of next December. To have failed to call Congress in extraordinary session in order to pass these great supply bills would have left these executive departments without funds after the 30th day of June, 1919. Now that these supply bills have been enacted into law it is my purpose to make only a brief statement, in order to furnish information so widely sought by Members of Congress and by the public.

The President did not see fit to call Congress in extraordinary session until the 19th day of May. When the Sixty-sixth Congress was thus convened only 37 legislative days remained of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, an altogether insufficient time within which Congress was required to organize and to pass these great supply bills by the 1st of July. A huge task thus confronted the Sixty-sixth Congress when it convened. That it performed this task and passed all of the great supply bills which had failed in the previous Congress by the beginning of the fiscal year is to the credit of the industry and fidelity to duty of its membership. [Applause.]

How well this Congress performed this great work, the appropriations themselves are the best witnesses. A comparison of the appropriations made by this Congress with the sums by which the same appropriations were last acted upon by the House or the Senate in the last Congress is very illuminating. Notwithstanding the fact that eight of the great appropriation bills failed of final enactment at the third session of the last Congress, yet the Sixty-fifth Congress appropriated for all purposes, including permanent and indefinite appropriations after deducting the amounts repealed by the second deficiency appropriation act, a net sum of $42,109,113,956.52.

The total of the regular annual appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, as passed at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and as passed during the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, is $3,033,151,733. To this should be added the appropriations to supply deficiencies, amounting to $1,112,450,234.11, and miscellaneous appropriations amounting to $1,117,708,436.47, and permanent appropriations estimated at $2,074,286,880, making a grand total of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and to supply deficiencies, of $7,337,597,283.58. Included in this aggregate are the appropriations made in the third session of the last Congress for the Diplomatic and Consular Service, amounting to $9,843,661.07; for fortifications and other works of defense, $11,214,209; for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, $97,963,831.77; for the Military Academy, $2,277,932.20; for pensions, $215,030,000; for the Postal Service, $609,466,149; for rivers and harbors, $33,378,364; and appropriations to supply deficiencies in the various executive departments, $292,714,084.71.

I shall insert in the RECORD a statement of appropriations made during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which will show (A) all the appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year 1920 and the deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1919, and prior years; (B) a comparison of appropriations for the fiscal year 1919, made during the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, with the appropriations for the fiscal year 1920, made during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to date; (C) a comparison of the appropriations agreed upon at this session of Congress, with the amounts asked for and considered during this session of the Sixty-sixth Congress; and (D) a comparison of the amounts of the eight appropriation bills which failed of final enactment at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, with the amounts in the same bills as they have been finally agreed upon at this session.

The work of this Congress, so far as it relates to appropriations, is especially reflected in tables C and D. By an examination of these tables it will be found that the agricultural appropriation act carries $33,899,761. A similar bill passed the House at the last session, was sent to the Senate, and there referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture, which reported it back to the Senate, carrying $37,344,852. The amount asked for by the Agricultural Department was $34,993,686. The bill, therefore, that has just been enacted into law carries $1,093,925 less than the amount asked for by the department, and $3,445,091 less than the amount carried by the bill as reported to the Senate in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

The appropriations contained in the Army bill aggregate $772,324,877.50. The War Department estimated for this service $1,268,322,269.04. In the last Congress this bill passed the House, was messaged to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee reported it back to the Senate carrying $1,240,500,066.98. The Army appropriation act, therefore, is $495,997,391.54 less than the amount asked for by the War Department, and is $468,175,189.48 less than the amount by which the bill was reported to the Senate in the last session of Congress.

The District of Columbia appropriation act carries $15,364,421. A similar bill passed the House and the Senate in the last session, and was pending in conference when Congress adjourned. It carried $14,446,364 as it passed the Senate. The amounts asked for by the District Commissioners and considered by this Congress totaled $15,635,701. The amount, therefore, by which this bill became a law is $918,057 more than was carried in the similar bill in the last session of Congress, but is $271,280 less than the amount estimated by the District Commissioners. In this connection it must be remembered that during the war the work of improving our streets and of building new school buildings had been stopped. The result was that the streets of the city of Washington were in a deplorable condition and the school facilities, so far as buildings were concerned, were grossly inadequate, and large appropriations are contained in the present act for improvement of streets and enlargement of school building facilities.

The Indian appropriation act carries $11,131,397.03. The amount estimated for the service was $11,939,813.89. This bill passed the Senate in the last session of Congress carrying $11,457,797.03. The law enacted at this session of Congress is therefore $326,400 less than the amount by which the bill passed the Senate in the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and is $808,416.86 less than the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Interior.

In the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the Navy bill passed the House and was last acted upon by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. This act appropriates $616,096,838.88. The amount carried by the bill when reported to the Senate in the last Congress was $824,708,121.88. The aggregate of the revised estimates for the naval service was $975,903,621.28. The naval appropriation act, therefore, carries $208,611,283 less than the amount carried by the bill as reported to the Senate in the last Congress, but it also carried $359,806,782.40 less than the amount asked for by the Navy Department and considered by this Congress.

The sundry civil appropriation act carries $605,160,207.95. The bill passed the House at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, carrying $851,171,859.25. The total amount asked for and considered by the Sixty-sixth Congress was $964,591,556.25. The appropriation made by this Congress for this service is therefore $246,011,651.30 less than the amount by which the sundry civil appropriation bill passed the House at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and is $359,431,348.30 less than the amount asked for and considered at this session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman require to conclude his remarks?

Mr. GOOD. I will require, I suppose, about 20 minutes. I did not think I would require so much time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 20 minutes in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that 20 minutes more?

Mr. MONDELL. In addition to the time he has already occupied.

Mr. CALDWELL. Twenty minutes more? Mr. Speaker, still further reserving the right to object, the gentleman is talking about bills passed without any reference to the deficiencies which must necessarily follow. The cock that crows in the morning does not always live to crow at night. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. The appropriation to supply deficiencies in the administration of the railroads by the President is $750,000,000. A similar bill passed the House and was subsequently reported by the Senate as a part of the third deficiency bill in the last Congress for a like amount. In the Sixty-fifth Congress the estimate for this service was $750,000,000, and the amount agreed upon by the House and reported to the Senate for this deficiency was the exact amount asked by the Railroad Administration. At this session of Congress the Railroad Administration asked for $1,200,000,000 for this service. The amount carried in the act is $450,000,000 less than the amount of the estimate.

The third deficiency act passed the House and was reported to the Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress, carrying $38,346,913.59, exclusive of the appropriation for the Railroad Administration above referred to, and also exclusive of $53,750,000 carried in the total of the sundry civil bill and proposed by the Senate to be transferred from that bill to the deficiency bill. The amount now carried in this act is $24,305,929.40, which is $14,040,984.19 less than the amount by which the bill was reported to the Senate in the last Congress, and is $18,458,749.54 less than the amount estimated by the various departments and considered by this Congress. In this connection, however, it should be stated that the amount carried in this act does not include $45,044,500 carried in the urgent deficiency appropriation act for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and for the payment of pensions. Of this sum $42,615,000 was not estimated at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and therefore not included in the total of $42,764,978.94 of the estimates for the third deficiency bill, nor was any part of it included in the $38,346,913.59 as the third deficiency bill passed the House and was reported to the Senate in the last Congress.

The third deficiency bill that failed in the last Congress did carry $4,220,000 for administration expenses in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. A part of this deficiency was supplied before the convening of this Congress out of the President's fund for the national security and defense. Of this $4,220,000, the sum of $2,429,500 is the only item carried in the urgent deficiency appropriation act that was considered at all by the Sixty-fifth Congress in connection with the third deficiency bill.

The appropriations made in the sundry civil bill that failed in the last Congress are a sad commentary on the administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. That bill carried for family allowances $33,000,000 and that sum was made immediately available. It carried for compensation to wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines $20,000,000, and it was anticipated that $53,000,000 would pay all family allowances of soldiers, sailors, and marines and their compensation claims to June 30, 1920. When this Congress convened it was advised by the Treasury Department that the checks for family allowances for the month of April had been drawn, but had not been sent to the families and dependents of soldiers, sailors, and marines because no funds have been appropriated for that service, and that it would require $39,615,000 to pay claims for family allowances up to June 30 of this year. That amount was immediately appropriated, as was the $2,429,500 for administrative expenses, and the sundry civil bill that has just passed carries $48,000,000 additional for family allowances, and $50,000,000 for compensation, making a grand total of $137,615,000 appropriated by this Congress for the payment of family allowances and compensation claims to our soldiers, sailors, and marines, as compared with $53,000,000 carried for the same purpose in the sundry civil bill that failed.

So, too, when this Congress convened it was confronted with the fact that there was a deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of pensions to the soldiers, amounting to $3,000,000. Immediately upon the convening of Congress this deficiency was supplied by an appropriation of the full amount of the estimate.

The net result of the work of this Congress, so far as it has acted on appropriations, notwithstanding the necessarily large increases for war-risk insurance, shows a net decrease of $939,692,541.97 in the appropriations made by this Congress, as compared with the last action of the Sixty-fifth Congress on the same bills.

But if the saving made by this Congress in the matter of appropriations is measured by the amounts asked for by the executive departments and considered by this Congress, the aggregate is $1,685,867,893.64, a magnificent record of achievement in 37 legislative days. [Applause.] And no doubt if Congress had been called in extraordinary session by the President immediately upon the adjournment of the Sixty-fifth Congress it would have had an opportunity to have made a more searching investigation and to have eliminated a great deal of waste and extravagance in the various executive departments.

During the past few days my attention has been directed to a propaganda that has been started by those intrusted with the administration of the law for the vocational rehabilitation of our wounded soldiers, sailors, and marines. One of the honored Members of this House has placed in my hands a telegram which is similar to many telegrams received by Members. This telegram reads as follows:

> Joker in sundry civil appropriation bill. Ten thousand disabled soldiers in Wisconsin affected greatly to their detriment by crippling Federal Board for Vocational Education. Strongly urge you to have it reconsidered.
> A. M. BRAYTON, Editor State Journal.

Telegrams have been received from Detroit to the effect that the vocational rehabilitation office in that city has been closed because of the lack of appropriations to carry on the work.

These telegrams were actuated, no doubt, by erroneous advices sent out by some member of the Board for Vocational Education here in Washington. The propaganda has its beginning in the executive department having to do with the administration of the vocational rehabilitation law. In order that there may be no misunderstanding with regard to this matter and that Members may advise their constituents, who are so deeply interested in the care and support of our wounded soldiers, sailors, and marines, I desire to read the entire provision carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill for vocational rehabilitation. It is as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $6,000,000, which shall be in lieu of the appropriation contained in the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1918: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum, except the following: One at $7,500, 1 at $5,000, 10 at $3,600 each, and 40 from $2,500 to $3,000 each, inclusive.

It is apparent from this provision of the law that $6,000,000 is available, or will be available when the President signs the sundry civil act, for vocational rehabilitation, and every dollar of that is available for rehabilitation work any place in the United States so long as it remains unexpended. [Applause.] When that appropriation is expended, if additional appropriations are necessary unquestionably they will be promptly forthcoming. The country will not and ought not to tolerate a cheeseparing policy with regard to the rehabilitation of our wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, and the country and Congress will not and should not tolerate this policy of misrepresentation and deceit carried on by those charged with the administration of the law. [Applause.] The only joker connected with this service will be found in the little men intrusted with the execution of the law. [Applause.] It is true we put a stop to the practice of one of the officials in this service drawing two salaries of $5,000 each from the Federal Government, and we placed a limit upon the salaries which any official connected with the administration of this law may draw at $7,500 per year. [Applause.]

I have no doubt that upon investigation it will be found that the salaries provided for in this bill are in excess of the amounts actually received in private life by the persons holding these positions. [Applause.] It is, indeed, to be regretted that men intrusted with the administration of this law, commissioned to bring aid and comfort to our wounded and disabled soldiers and sailors, should add to the discomfort and anxiety of hundreds of thousands of these boys who are wounded and entitled to the benefits of this service by giving them to understand that Congress had made no provision for their vocational rehabilitation. The man responsible for this contemptible falsehood should be summarily dismissed from the Government service. [Applause.]

A few days ago the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], in a very interesting speech, defended the action of the House in the last Congress because of the excessive appropriations carried in the bills as they passed the House. He made the astounding claim that the amounts by which the bills passed the last Congress in excess of the aggregate carried in the bills that passed this Congress would not have been expended, but that such excess of appropriations would have been covered into the Treasury of the United States. I hope the position of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] will be the position of the President and the head of every executive department of the Government, for if his position is the correct one there will be no necessity for any deficiency appropriations. [Applause on the Republican side.] If, therefore, deficiencies are created or shall hereafter arise in these appropriations, they must be attributed to waste and extravagance in the departments where deficiency appropriations shall hereafter be sought. [Applause on the Republican side.] Time alone will tell. But one of two things is certain—either the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was misleading the House in that wonderful speech, or, if deficiency appropriations shall hereafter be asked for the same service, then the department asking for a deficiency stands convicted of the charge of waste and extravagance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The enactment of 10 large supply bills in 37 legislative days, in order that they might become laws by the beginning of this fiscal year, is an achievement without a parallel in the history of congressional appropriations. I shall put in the RECORD a summary showing the annual appropriation laws, with the dates of approval, which were not enacted in time to be effective from the first day of the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made. That summary will show that during the Fifty-fourth,

Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Congresses, all Republican Congresses, every general appropriation bill was passed and became a law before the beginning of the fiscal year to which they each related. In the Sixty-second Congress the House was Democratic and the Senate was Republican. In the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses both House and Senate were Democratic.

During those Congresses there was a failure in the enactment of many of the appropriation laws before the beginning of the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made. For example, in the Sixty-second Congress, when the Democrats first came into control of the House, nine of the great appropriation bills failed of passage before the beginning of the next fiscal year, and it was necessary to pass continuing resolutions in order that the Government might function. So, too, in the Sixty-third Congress four of the great appropriation bills failed of enactment before the beginning of the next fiscal year. In the Sixty-fourth Congress seven of the great supply bills failed, and in the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress seven of the great supply bills failed of enactment before the beginning of the following fiscal year, and in the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress eight of the great supply bills had failed of enactment when Congress adjourned.

In comparison with this record of inefficiency I desire to place the record of 16 years of Republican administration, from the Fifty-fourth to the Sixty-first Congresses, inclusive, when every regular annual appropriation bill was enacted into law by the beginning of the fiscal year to which the appropriations related. [Applause on Republican side.] So, too, in this Congress, in 37 legislative days, a Republican Congress accomplished what a Democratic Congress had failed to perform in three long months. In 37 legislative days this Congress enacted into law the eight large supply bills that failed of enactment in the last Congress.

When these appropriation acts are compared with the bills acted upon by the previous Congress for the same service, it is found that this Congress has saved to the taxpayers of the United States $939,692,541.97. [Applause on Republican side.] If, however, the saving to the taxpayers is the difference between the estimates of the executive departments and the appropriations made by Congress, then that saving reaches the stupendous sum of $1,685,867,893.64. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing these tables to which I have referred in my speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman for the insertion of the tables indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The tables referred to are as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], under the special order, is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, conditions in Mexico have reached the stage that it becomes our duty to inquire what is going on, what is being done, and what the administration intends doing. For this purpose I introduced on June 19, 1919, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, requested to send forthwith to the House of Representatives complete copies of correspondence, including letters, communications, notes, and telegrams between the United States Government and the Government of Mexico from the 1st day of January, 1915, to date; also copies of communications, orders, letters, telegrams, etc., between the Department of State and officers of the United States Army or Navy, either direct or through the War and Navy Departments, respectively, pertaining to Mexican affairs from the 1st day of January, 1915, to date.

This method of procedure is not new. A similar resolution was introduced on the 1st of November, 1877, requiring the Secretary of State to furnish the House of Representatives with data of the same nature asked for in my resolution, and that resolution, strange to say, referred to Mexico. The Secretary of State was then Mr. William M. Evarts and who 12 days after the resolution was passed transmitted all of the papers pertaining to the Mexican border troubles, and these papers, consisting of 45 different documents, contained 244 printed pages, and is known as Executive Document No. 13, first session of the Forty-fifth Congress. It is really worth the while of every Member of this House to glance through the pages of that report, change the dates and names, and you have the conditions of the disorder, the turmoil, murder, and robbery of Mexico of to-day.

The country was then startled, as I am sure it would be now if the facts were known, in learning of the actual conditions in Mexico, and the fact that the country knew and was determined to take aggressive action so impressed the Mexicans that we did not have trouble with that country for a period of about 40 years.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will ask not to be interrupted, because I am using notes, and I am not in the habit of using them.

With the facts disclosed, public opinion became so strong that on August 13, 1878, Secretary Evarts transmitted to Mr. Foster, our then minister of Mexico, the famous message which brought home to the Mexicans that this country would protect its citizens, would stand for its rights, and that no excuse would be accepted for any violation of these rights or any damage to American citizens or American property.

This real, red-blooded American message would so fit conditions now that I want to read it to you:

MR. EVARTS, SECRETARY OF STATE, TO MR. FOSTER, MINISTER TO MEXICO, AUGUST 13, 1878.

The first duty of a government is to protect life and property. This is a paramount obligation. For this governments are instituted, and governments neglecting or failing to perform it become worse than useless. This duty the Government of the United States has determined to perform to the extent of its power toward its citizens on the border. It is not solicitous—it never has been—about the methods or ways in which that protection shall be accomplished, whether by formal treaty stipulation or by informal convention, whether by the action of judicial tribunals or that of military forces. Protection in fact to American lives and property is the sole point upon which the United States are tenacious. In securing it they have a right to ask the cooperation of their sister Republic. So far the authorities of Mexico, military and civil, in the vicinity of the border appear not only to take no steps to effectively check the raids or punish the raiders, but demur and object to steps taken by the United States. * * *

I am not unmindful of the fact that, as you have repeatedly reported, there is reason to believe that the Mexican Government really desires to check these disorders. According to the views you have presented its statesmen are believed to be sagacious and patriotic and well disposed to comply with all international obligations. But, as you represent, they encounter, or apprehend that they may encounter, a hostile public feeling adverse to the United States, especially in these border localities, thwarting their best intentions and efforts. It is greatly to be regretted that such a state of perverted public feeling should exist. But its existence does not exonerate the Mexican Government from any obligation under international law. Still less does it relieve this Government from its duties to guard the welfare of the American people. The United States Government can not allow marauding bands to establish themselves upon its borders, with liberty to invade and plunder United States territory with impunity and then, when pursued, to take refuge across the Rio Grande under protection of the plea of the integrity of the soil of the Mexican Republic.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For a question.

Mr. FLOOD. Is the gentleman advocating intervention in Mexico now?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. I am sure there is no one in this House who should be as cognizant of the actual affairs in Mexico as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the last Congress.

The difference between the note of 1878 and the note of 1919 is that the Mexican people then knew that we would back every word we said, and this note is what caused what was known in Mexico for 40 years as "El Fantasma" (the specter). This specter was the fear of American wrath; that the United States would go down there and punish the murderers and thieves and establish order. It was this fear in the hearts of the Mexicans that kept them straight for a number of years. Even President Diaz feared it. Mr. Evarts's words are almost prophetic. The difference between 1878 and 1919 is that we then impressed the Mexican people that we meant business, while in 1919 we sent notes but failed to enforce what we said. So that the fear of 1878 has become the indifference of 1919, and the Mexican people feel that they can do as they like—shoot Americans, commit robbery, confiscate property, and get away with it. It is true to-day as it was in 1878; we do not care what means the Mexican Government takes to preserve order, to protect American lives and property; let them use the law or their police or the military; but we should insist that they do something and must henceforth refuse to overlook any omission on the part of the Mexican Government toward Americans and American rights.

Not so very long ago, on the 6th day of January, 1916, the Senate had a resolution, introduced by Mr. FALL, of New Mexico, calling upon the President to inform the Senate upon Mexican conditions. I call your attention to the resolution and the information submitted. It will be found in Senate Document No. 324, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. Time does not permit me to read it now, but the contrast of actual performance and the promises therein made is so glaring that I will insert some of the documents therein contained as part of these remarks. But let me point out to you some of the assurances then given by Mr. Carranza to the President.

The message was transmitted by the President to the Senate on February 17, 1916. In that report a message of the President of the United States of June 2, 1915, containing a warning to the leaders of the factions, was telegraphed to the American consular officers in Mexico for circulation, in which the President pointed out that no government existed in Mexico; that she has been swept by civil war as if by fire; that there is no proper protection for her own citizens or any citizens at work within her territory; and instructed consular officers to make known the views of the United States in the following forceful language:

In these circumstances the people and Government of the United States can not stand indifferently by and do nothing to serve their neighbor. They want nothing for themselves in Mexico. Least of all do they desire to settle her affairs for her or claim any right to do so. But neither do they wish to see utter ruin come upon her; and they deem it their duty as friends and neighbors to lend any aid they properly can to any instrumentality which promises to be effective in bringing about a settlement which will embody the real objects of the revolution—constitutional government and the rights of the people. Patriotic Mexicans are sick at heart and cry out for peace and for every self-sacrifice that may be necessary to procure it. Their people cry out for food, and will presently hate as much as they fear every man, in their country or out of it, who stands between them and their daily bread.

It is time, therefore, that the Government of the United States should frankly state the policy which in these extraordinary circumstances it becomes its duty to adopt. It must presently do what it has not hitherto done or felt at liberty to do—lend its active moral support to some man or group of men, if such may be found, who can rally the suffering people of Mexico to their support in an effort to ignore, if they can not unite, the warring factions of the country, return to the constitution of the Republic, so long in abeyance, and set up a government at Mexico City which the great powers of the world can recognize and deal with, a government with whom the program of the revolution will be a business and not merely a platform. I therefore publicly and very solemnly call upon the leaders of factions in Mexico to act, to act together, and to act promptly for the relief and redemption of their prostrate country. I feel it to be my duty to tell them that if they can not accommodate their differences and unite for this great purpose within a very short time this Government will be constrained to decide what means should be employed by the United States in order to help Mexico save herself and serve her people.

This statement covered the situation fully. The trouble is we stopped there; we backed the wrong man; we aided Carranza, who brought chaos out of disorder, who organized plunder, sanctioned murder, disregarded American rights, and the solemn admonishment that the United States would take steps to help Mexico save herself has not been carried out, and therefore we have the situation that this warning fell flat, while that of Secretary Evarts produced the desired results. Mexico is to-day starving and without a government, as it was on June 2, 1915, the date of the President's statement. Mexico is apparently no nearer a solution of her troubles than she was, and, as stated in that same statement, she is still swept by civil war as if by fire.

Mr. FLOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD. Does not he think that the President thought that his message had had the effect when he afterwards recognized the Carranza government as the de facto government of Mexico?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I have not forgotten Carranza in these notes that I have before me. I will come to him in just a minute.

On October 5, 1915, in this same Senate document will be found a laconic statement from Carranza, in which he states that the situation is constantly improving and states that the railways are being repaired. The railways are to-day in worse condition than they ever were. He said that it is true that a minor officer killed a young lady, but succeeded in escaping, and adds, "He is being pursued, and when arrested he will receive severe punishment." This simply goes to show how lightly murder is considered by Carranza. In that same report will be found what is known as the plan of Guadalupe, in which it is declared that Carranza, who shall be the first commander in chief, shall immediately convene general and local elections to elect representatives and a government. This has been totally ignored. In the same report will be found the decree of Gen. Carranza in which again the promise is reiterated of convening a general election and the establishing of a constitutional government. This he has failed to do. A farce of an election was held, at which only Carranza soldiers were permitted to vote.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman did not answer my question, if he intended to answer it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall answer it. When I have finished with Carranza I think the distinguished ex-chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be better acquainted with him. [Applause.]

The same statement to the Senate gives a list of Americans killed from 1913 to 1915, and in reference to this Secretary Lansing says:

> While 76 Americans lost their lives in the entire territory of Mexico during the years 1913, 1914, and 1915, in the same period there were 20 civilian Americans and 16 American soldiers killed on American soil adjacent to the international boundary (inclosures Nos. 12B and 12C), and during those years there were approximately 92 Mexicans killed in the same area (inclosure No. 12D).
> These figures indicate that a condition of lawlessness prevailed along the border, due in large measure to factional conflicts in Mexican territory for ports of entry and to the unfriendly personal relations existing between the American and Mexican residents in that region. The department, however, has no reliable information as to the number of Mexicans killed on the Mexican side of the boundary and in its immediate vicinity as a consequence of this state of disorder.

I maintain that if we had all the records asked for in my resolution it would show that the same deplorable conditions exist to-day as existed in 1916, when the report was sent to the Senate.

I need not point out that it is difficult to get accurate information on Mexico—that is the reason of my resolution. I am certain that if we have the facts the results would be startling to the American people. I have not even scratched the surface; I have only lightly dusted it, and, in my opinion, there is sufficient reason to cause alarm and to compel the adoption of a fixed, definite policy toward Mexico.

From what meager information I have I am convinced that we have not followed a fixed definite policy in our attitude toward Mexico. I believe that if the facts are known it will be disclosed that the attitude of our State Department toward Mexico has been one series of inconsistencies. Everybody seems to know that something is wrong in Mexico; everybody knows that United States armed forces entered Mexican territory only a short time ago. Pershing's expedition into Mexico has not yet been forgotten; still there seems to be no exact knowledge as to what it is all about. We went after Villa; were chasing Villa. Just as we were about to get him our troops were ordered away. We went to Tampico to have the flag saluted. Before the flag was saluted the Navy was ordered away. We entered Mexico a short time ago and a few hours later our troops returned, and the incident remained to a certain extent unexplained.

A few days ago my colleague from New York [Mr. GOULD] made a statement on the floor of the House and told of the number of American lives lost in Mexico. Still no action; still no redress; still no fixed policy; still indecision. Is it not time that we get into the facts; that we find out for ourselves where we stand, lest later it may be too late? Let me point out just a few of our diplomatic inconsistencies. I call it that to be polite.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman what action the gentleman would propose we should take in Mexico in reference to troubles about these oil fields and other troubles that we have had there in the last nine years?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that in my time. [Laughter.] Our country recognized the Carranza Government. We refused to recognize Huerta or have anything to do with him, because it was stated by the President of the United States that the Huerta government came into existence by means of a revolution, causing the death of Madero, although we recognized the Madero Government, which came about in a similar method—a revolution against Diaz régime—and obtained power by force. We recognize the Carranza Government, although it was the outcome of a revolution against Huerta, so it is difficult to understand how the Carranza Government differs in its coming into being to that of Madero or Huerta. It is my belief that if all the facts were before us, it would be shown that the government of Carranza is no government at all. That disorder, chaos, revolution, and disease are prevalent throughout that country. That during the period that we were at war and all our energy given to that struggle the government of Carranza, whatever there was of it, was not only anti-American but decidedly and actively pro-German. I believe that if the facts were before us we could see that Carranza is far from having control of his own country, and has no more authority, power, or representation than the rest of the factions in Mexico. I have here a map which will give a general idea of the division of power in Mexico. It is rudely arranged—I did it myself, and, of course, the exact boundaries are not accurate, but will give a general idea as to the situation. The total area of Mexico is 765,537 square miles. Carranza misgoverns in the States left in white on this map, part of Vera Cruz, State of Mexico, Hidalgo, Queretaro, Guanajuato, Durango, Nuevo, Leon, Zacatecas, part of Coahuila, and part of Jalisco, a total of 314,478 square miles; less than half of the total area of Mexico.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman state there how many States in Mexico the Carranza government is actually in control of?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. Here is my map.

Mr. FLOOD. I am glad I have made a suggestion that will help the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say this, that I called upon our military intelligence to give me some facts about Mexico. The military intelligence of the American Expeditionary Forces certainly did splendid work during the war, and I came home with a great deal of confidence in it. After whispering and conversations they said, "We are going to send it to you." When they did not do it I asked them why not, and they said, "We have sent you the information." I said, "Where is it?" They replied that it was in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I asked them why it was there. They said, "We can not send it any other place." Here is the information I got; it is marked "memorandum" and says:

> This compilation of notes on Mexico is furnished for the official use of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the understanding that the information be not disclosed without the authority of the Secretary of War.

I slept with this for a day. I was afraid to look at it; afraid that some spy would take it from me. I told the military intelligence that it was of no use to me if I could not disclose it. A major came to me and said, "Go ahead and read it." I read it on one Sunday morning. There was nothing in it; and to my surprise on that same Sunday, in reading the New York Times, I found the same article and the same map verbatim. That is the confidential information.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I can not.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does not the gentleman know that it is a fact that Zapata has control in the State of Oaxaca and has had for 15 years?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know he has the control of the Morelos. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. But the Zapatistos have control over that State and Morales as well. So that is so much less under the control of Carranza.

Felix Diaz, who is commander in chief of a faction known as the Felicistas, not only holds three or four small parts between Vera Cruz and Tampico but has under his command a large force of volunteers—40,000 men—comparatively well equipped, stanch supporters, who will stand by him until the Carranza Government is overthrown. The Felicistas occupy and control the States of Chiapas, Tabasco, Oaxaca, Guerrero, Puebla, part of Michoacan, part of Vera Cruz, part of Tamaulipas, and part of Coahuila, territory indicated on this map in yellow, comprising about 281,732 miles. I want to point out that the Felicistas forces are in control of all the extreme southern portion of Mexico, surrounding the Carranza forces in the east and west, and have access to the sea—Vera Cruz coast—where only a few days ago they occupied the port of Tlacotalpan; also north, in the State of Tamaulipas; and a small force in Coahuila, while not very strong, is sufficient to cause embarrassment to communication of the railways there, which, I understand, are constantly blocked and destroyed when Carranza seeks to transport troops through that territory. Campeche and Yucatan are under the control of Gen. Alvarado. Gen. Alvarado is ostensibly under Carranza, and friendly to him only because he is permitted to levy his own taxes, collect money in any way he desires, has absolute control there, and is working on some sort of a fifty-fifty basis with Carranza. This is possibly only because of the intervening territory between the Alvarado States and Carranza States being occupied by Felicistas. The mileage of these two States is included in the territory controlled by Carranza, but it can not be said that Carranza has absolute control over this portion of Mexico. Up north Chihuahua, as you all know, is under the control of the Villacestas, with Villa and Angeles, who is described by our military intelligence as the ablest general south of the Rio Grande. Chihuahua has a mileage of 89,974 square miles. Sonora is entirely under the control of the Yaqui Indians, occupying the whole State, a mileage of 76,619 square miles, and is not controlled by the Carranza Government. They are absolutely unfriendly, and will fight Carranza every time they have an opportunity, and are only kept from doing so by being cut off by the Villa forces, other rebels, and distance.

On the western coast the States of Sinaloa, Territorio Tepic, part of Jalisco, and Colima, not even the military intelligence has any accurate information, but it is known and disclosure of the facts will show, I am certain, that these States are not under the control of Carranza, but under the control of various rebel chiefs who are opposing the Carranza régime, not friendly to it, and will continue to fight as long as Carranza remains in power. The State of Morelos is entirely in the possession and under the control of the Zapata forces, known as Zapatistas. They are fighting Carranza, are not connected with the Felicistas, but are friendly to them. It is a small State of 2,734 square miles. I call your particular attention to this small strip in red, the State of Vera Cruz. That is under the control of the Pelaez faction. This faction is the best-equipped best-uniformed army of all factions. It has about, from latest reports, which no doubt the Department of State will obtain in due time, 5,000 armed men under the command of Gen. Pelaez. These forces protect the oil industries from being robbed by the Carranza faction. It is supported and paid by the oil companies. I understand that the pay roll is something like $180,000 a month, and that several million dollars have already been paid to Pelaez for necessary protection. Skirmishes between the Pelaez and Carranza forces take place continuously, the line varying according to the successes of these skirmishes, as the Carranza forces are eager to come down and take possession of the oil property. Pelaez is naturally antagonistic to Carranza. He is friendly to the Felicistas or to any movement which will bring about the overthrow of Carranza and the establishment of a decent government in Mexico. He is anxious to be liberated from the control of the oil companies, as he does not desire to be under their control when a real government is established. As a matter of necessity, he accepts their aid at this time as it serves his purpose in fighting the Carranza forces.

On the extreme edge of the southeastern extremity is Territorio Quintano Roo, where anarchy reigns and is entirely in the control of the Maya Indians. This will show at a glance how far Carranza represents the entire State of Mexico. The constant fighting that is going on goes to prove that the Carranza government is not a staple existing government, but a fighting faction helping to keep disorder in that unhappy country.

The Felix Diaz faction represents the intellectual faction of Mexico. Its forces are made up of the educated people of Mexico and the better element, who are sincerely striving to put Mexico on its feet to establish a government of law and order. Whatever we may think of the old Diaz régime has nothing to do with the present attempt of this faction to overthrow the Carranza government. So that, as I said, Carranza has control of less than half the territory of Mexico.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I will ask the gentleman this question, if he will permit me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that there is a duly recognized governor in each of the States of Mexico recognizing Carranza, except four?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but the recognition is only pro forma.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of the population of Mexico is under Carranza?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can get that information for the gentleman, but I have not got it in my data here.

I believe the State Department has followed a series of inconsistencies. Permit me to point out some of these which are so well known:

We did not approve of the Huerta government for, as I stated before, it was deemed by our State Department that its coming into existence was based on bloody revolution. However, we recognized Madero. Huerta was bound to go—we said as much. The President in his message insisted that Huerta leave at once. It is generally considered, I am sure, that Huerta had the possibility of stabilizing Mexico, putting it on a working basis, and of actually bringing about some, at least, of the much needed reforms, but was not given a chance. I am holding no brief for Huerta or for any other faction, but all the beautiful theory of equal division of land and true democracy expressed by Mr. Wilson could not at the time be put into actual practice in Mexico. Huerta knew the country as no other man knew it, had the following, and was bound to bring order out of chaos.

President Wilson was not alone in his sharp statement of indignation. Germany also was against Huerta, and a few days after this country, through its President, expressed indignation against the Huerta government the Frankfort Gazette, of Frankfort, Germany, on April 6, 1914, referred to Mr. Wilson's attitude, saying:

> This idealist's place is in the political world, and we might well consider ourselves fortunate if we had at the head of the German Government idealists of such strong, well, and progressive tendencies as Mr. Wilson.

You all know how deep Germany had already entered into Mexico, and its Wilhelm Strasse knew that it could not expect special privileges, assistance, and friendliness from Huerta to the extent that it could from Carranza. Germany then, as she does to-day, knew more about Mexico than we do right here at her very door.

The President was bound in 1914–15 to bring about an equitable distribution of the land in Mexico, to relieve poverty, to abolish exploitation, and to bring about a perfect and ideal economic change in that country. The President's views along these lines can be found in an article entitled "Mexico," in the Saturday Evening Post of May 23, 1914. While all of this sounds good, present conditions reveal that it did not work out according to the President's prophecies. The equal division of land as a practical matter has been found somewhat difficult, and it does not exist even in this country, and while I have nothing to say against such equitable and ideal conditions Mexico surely is the last place in the world that experiment of this kind could be attempted. What good could come of a distribution; how could we bring about such economical reforms in Mexico? I am certain, if the facts called for in my resolution are before you, Carranza is the last man in the world to bring out the ideal conditions expressed in the President's statement. Are you aware that famine exists in Mexico to-day and existed in 1914; that disease and pestilence are prevalent, with smallpox, malaria, and dysentery raging all over the country? Nothing has been done to better conditions along these lines. In Mexico thousands upon thousands eat reptiles, bugs, slimy deposits from stagnant pools, and things of like nature, driven to this by the pangs of hunger. They are driven to it by actual necessity, by the desire to live, rather than die of hunger. Assuming that the land of Mexico could have been equally divided, these unhappy people were in no condition to derive any benefit from it. The land must be irrigated so that it will be fruitful. I shall not go into the agricultural statistics of that country at this time, but I ask you to look it up, and you will find nothing has been done by Carranza since his recognition by this Government to better the land. Not only did he fail to reform land laws but did not even endeavor to distribute some food to the natives in various parts of the country, who are dying of hunger. The Mexican question is a problem of life and death of a nation; it can not be treated lightly or made an experimental station of ideals and fancy theories.

After Huerta was overthrown by Carranza and we recognized Carranza our troubles started. Huerta became a bandit, an outlaw, and everybody connected with him was likewise branded, and the President of the United States would have no official dealings with either Huerta or any of his followers. I just desire to point out that one of Huerta's chief ministers and followers is Leon Dela Barra. He was in Huerta's cabinet and was with him to the very end. While we would not have anything to do with him, although a man of high intellect, a scholar, he was declared an outlaw and his banishment decreed, and he was compelled to leave his native country. Yet we find the same President of the United States compelled to sit in conference with Mr. Dela Barra at the peace conference, where Mr. Dela Barra was the adviser on Latin America, selected as such by France and the Allies.

Speaking of Huerta naturally reminds us of the Tampico incident.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask you one question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will give you time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman contend that Americans were protected under Huerta's administration?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He did not have a chance.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman make that contention, that Americans were protected under Huerta's administration?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Better than under Carranza. They could not be worse protected than under Carranza. There were people then and there are people to-day who believe that we went to Tampico and Vera Cruz to have the American flag saluted. What happened there? The flag incident of Tampico is so well known that much need not be said at this time. You recall that a boat containing some American sailors on a lawful mission happened to land within the firing line while a fight was on between the Huerta and Carranza troops. The boat was in command of a junior officer who could speak no Spanish; the Mexican officer could speak no English, and, failing to understand each other, were taken into custody.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman where he got the information about Tampico?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will tell the gentleman that I got my information by not swallowing everything that the babbling attachés of the State Department come here to tell us.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is making misstatements about the whole Tampico incident. Not a thing happened as he says it happened.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to read the admiral's report.

The matter was reported to the State Department. Huerta was still in power, although repudiated or rather not recognized by our Government. This was an insult which could not go unchallenged, punishment was necessary, and the fleet was ordered to Tampico. Our flag must be saluted. Just how Huerta, not being recognized, could salute the flag is a matter which has not yet been fully explained by our Department of State. A few days after that Vera Cruz was occupied—for that several versions have been given. It is my belief that if all facts pertaining thereto was before us, as called for in my resolution, it will be learned that the purpose of the Vera Cruz expedition was to stop the German ship Ypiranga, loaded with a large quantity of ammunition, from getting into the hands of Huerta. Let me tell you a little about the history of the Ypiranga. The Ypiranga was loaded with ammunition, either in Russia or Germany, purchased by Huerta from the Russian Government. All of this was known to the Department of State. The Ypiranga sailed, and part of the fleet was ordered to Vera Cruz to seize the port, the customhouse, and the cable for the purpose of preventing the Ypiranga from getting her cargo to Huerta, all of which is doubtful whether we had a right to do—Carranza then being a rebel against the actual government with which we were at peace. We took Vera Cruz on or about April 24, 1914. I want to call your attention to the taking and the occupation of Vera Cruz contained in Document No. 324 to the Senate, where no reference is made to the Ypiranga. Our fleet arrived at Tampico for the purpose of having the flag saluted about April 10, 1914. Admiral Mayo, at Tampico, was ordered to join the fleet at Vera Cruz to reenforce with his men the landing expedition, and the flag incident was for the moment forgotten. Admiral Mayo was so surprised that he was ordered to abandon Tampico, leaving the American residents at the mercy of the Mexicans, that he cabled for confirmation three times. It is generally stated that the Americans would have been murdered had they not been protected by the commander of the German cruiser Dresden, who was then at Tampico, and served notice that any assault upon Americans in Tampico would be resented by him and proper action taken. The Ypiranga arrived in Vera Cruz, went to the dock, was prevented from discharging her cargo, inasmuch as our forces had possession of the port. I am informed that the facts asked for in my resolution would show that after staying there for some time the commander of the Ypiranga went to the American commander of the port, Capt. Stickney, of the United States Navy, I believe, and informed the captain that he could not remain any longer with his cargo; that he desired to unload, and if no instructions were given him, he informed Capt. Stickney that he would steam out of the port and go to the Puerto Mexico, which port was in the possession of the Huerta forces, and there deliver his ammunition to the Government, indicating that he would go to the Puerto Mexico, thereby giving opportunity for capture up to the very last moment. Capt. Stickney cabled this information to the State Department, and asked for instructions, and the State Department, in keeping with its undecided policy, its blow-hot-and-cold attitude, ordered Capt. Stickney to let the Ypiranga sail. So that we see the Ypiranga sailing out of Vera Cruz, saluting our ships as she left the harbor going to Puerto Mexico and deliver her cargo, all of which, through the blunder and indecision of the State Department, cost this country millions of dollars for that expedition and 19 lives and 70 wounded American boys, not to mention the innocent women and children of Vera Cruz who, unfortunately, met their death owing to the street fighting that took place. Do you wonder why the Mexicans are not afraid of our notes?

Another episode in our Mexican situation was the raid on Columbus by the Villa faction. This took place on March 10, 1916, under Carranza. Villa denies that he took part in any raid—there is no proof that he did. However, I want to point out that in November of 1915 when Villa was besieging the town of Aguas Prietas and about to take it, I have been informed and I believe the records will bear me out, the United States Government allowed the Government of Carranza to send Mexican troops through American territory in order to encircle Villa and thereby force him to withdraw his forces and fall into the hands of the Carranza forces in the south. Of course, Villa had not learned, perhaps, the niceties of diplomacy and could not understand how the armed Carranza forces had the right to enter American territory to obtain favorable position and attack him from United States territory. I am not trying to justify the raid on Columbus; I am simply trying to show what the feeling of the natives of northern Mexico must have been toward us as a result of permitting Carranza troops to violate our neutrality for the purposes stated.

Let me tell you something else about our inconsistency. You will remember we would not let Huerta get out of the United States, and when he started to go to Mexico we arrested him in El Paso, put him in jail, and kept him there until he died.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I take it the gentleman wants to make a correct statement?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact that Huerta only stayed in jail 30 days, and that he died in his palatial home in El Paso?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He died, did he not?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I presume he did.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Another striking example of our inconsistency: Only a very few months ago Blanquet, an open, avowed Felicista, an arch enemy of the Carranza mob, left New York City with the declared purpose of taking command of an expedition against Carranza. Mark you, we are Carranza's friend and protector. He took the train in New York and went to Key West, openly declaring his purpose at Key West. He was held by immigration or Department of Justice, or whichever officials had control of outgoing traffic and examination of passports. He was kept there for a period of about a week. He arrived in Key West under the name of Torres, his mother's maiden name, had a passport of some kind under that name, and after a thorough interrogation voluntarily informed the officials that he was Aurelio Blanquet; that he was going to Habana, and from there would embark at the first opportunity to Mexico to take command of the forces of Felix Diaz against Carranza. In order that there may be no misunderstanding to the person I refer to, I show you here a photograph of Gen. Blanquet; he is the same general who was in charge of the expedition that executed Emperor Maximilian in Mexico; he was a great general and a good patriot. The State Department again, in keeping with its undecided policy, after holding him a week, cabled him permission to proceed, again blowing hot and cold. Blanquet proceeded to Habana, remained there a month, this Government having ample facilities right there to apprehend Blanquet and return him to the United States. So the Department of State has not even kept faith with Carranza. Blanquet arrived in Mexico, met Felix Diaz, was on his way to another point, when he was ambushed by the Carranza forces, he being at the time with a very few followers. Rather than be captured by the Carranza forces, Blanquet jumped over a cliff and met a soldierly death. Now, just to point out the caliber and character of Carranza and his government, let me tell you that when Blanquet's body was found it was decapitated and Blanquet's head, with all barbaric characteristics, exhibited to the public in a public building at Vera Cruz for a period of three days and at night it was illuminated by electric lights. I show you photograph of Gen. Blanquet's head as exhibited in Vera Cruz, reproduced in the Vera Cruz newspaper, and about this the Carranza papers and his following gloated and enjoyed this gory exhibition. That is the type of government, the character of man that this country is now seeking to aid and support. And why, if Blanquet was a rebel going to oppose Carranza, was he permitted to go, when Huerta, on a like mission, was arrested at El Paso and thrown into jail and kept there until he died?

If Carranza has no respect for his own blood, how can we expect him to protect American lives? Carranza has no government; the Carranza régime is nothing but a despotic, forceful dominion. It is so described by everyone he has had dealings with, by everyone who lived in Mexico, by everyone who knows conditions, except our own State Department perhaps.

Another example of Carranza's respect and regard for law and order was shown when Gen. Alvarez was captured a few months ago, he having gone to Mexico with Gen. Blanquet, he was put in jail awaiting trial. His lawyers obtained a writ from the civil tribunal, but before the writ could be executed he was taken out and shot; and yet we recognize the Carranza government because it typified law and order, justice and mercy.

The whole world knows that Carranza was not only anti-American but decidedly pro-German during the war. One of the glaring proofs of the pro-German tendencies is that of Isidor Fabela, who was Carranza's minister to the Argentine Republic. During the war Isidor Fabela left Argentina and went to Spain, taking with him Baroness von Shenk, a notorious German spy. At Cadiz, Spain, and throughout Spain he registered with this spy at hotels and met German secret-service agents and negotiated business with them. From Spain Fabela went to Germany and returned to Mexico via Habana. The military and naval intelligence officials of Spain and Habana, I am informed, have information that will confirm this statement. In fact, it was general gossip when I was in Spain for a few days in 1918.

Louis Cabrera, the newly appointed Secretary of the Treasury of the Carranza cabinet, and appointed only a few days ago, is one of the other numerous affronts which Carranza presents to this country. Cabrera was during the war notoriously pro-German and has been and is now decidedly anti-American. Military and naval intelligence, if they were on the job, should have proof of this fact. In an interview with Louis Cabrera given to the newspaper Union at Buenos Aires on May 31, 1918, he made the following statement—mark you, we were then at war:

> I am of the opinion that countries will attain the highest development are those that had the force of character to remain neutral in this war, especially Argentina, Chile, and Mexico, which said countries, convinced of what they are and what their position is to be in the universal concert, have known what stand to take.

While in Buenos Aires Cabrera was constantly with Manuel Ugarte. Up to the very last moment Manuel Ugarte was a German agent on the German pay roll. Records of the department will also disclose that Carranza had decided to overthrow Madero, and the evidence of his activities in that direction were in the possession of Von Eckert, the German ambassador at Mexico—hence Germany's anxiety when Huerta got in ahead of him and Germany's great admiration for the stand this country took against Huerta, as indicated in the article from the Frankfort paper which I read before. They wanted Carranza in power; they wanted Huerta out; and it seems they were very successful, and we played right into their hands.

Candido Aguilar, who is the personal representative of Carranza in this country, has always been anti-American. He is not a diplomat; he is not a statesman; he is not a scholar. He is Carranza's son-in-law, who if he were not on a diplomatic mission would be barred from entering into this country under two provisions of our immigration laws. Aguilar's record is such as to make him a worthy representative of the Carranza Government. Aguilar comes from the State of Chihuahua. Carranza was governor of that State at one time, and while governor of the State he practiced the art which is universally established in his government—that of systematic graft. The American Seating Co., while selling school furniture to the State of Chihuahua was compelled, through their Mexican agent, to double their prices, which was the rate fixed by Carranza himself as his graft on every purchase made on behalf of the State.

A few days ago Mr. Aguilar was dined and wined in New York City and stated that it was not true that the Mexican Government intends to exercise dominion over all oil and minerals under the surface of the soil. This was reproduced in all papers of the United States, and two days later a dispatch from Mexico City stated that Aguilar denied that he made any such statement. I believe both statements. I believe he did make the statement in New York and also the denial in Mexico City. That is in keeping with Carranza's attitude toward Americans.

Americans in Mexico are not permitted to carry arms; citizens of other nationalities are. During the period of war, for instance, Americans were not permitted to carry arms, while Germans were. The men who were engaged in oil work were often attacked, and in some instances murdered. At one time the Carranza Government issued an order that Americans who would register their names, addresses, and the number of their revolver or rifle would be issued a license. This was immediately taken up by a large number of Americans working around the oil wells. Licenses were issued. Two days later they were revoked and all arms confiscated, and in that way the Carranza Government obtained a large amount of new arms, which it seems they needed.

During the war the radio station at Vera Cruz was in constant operation, and was in direct touch with the German wireless station at Nauen. Messages were intercepted in this country, and unimportant messages, of course, were sent in German or Spanish. These were received by the Intelligence and Secret Service Department. The important messages were in code. These codes were never deciphered, so that Germany was in constant communication of what was going on in this country, and our Intelligence and Secret Service were unable to decipher these messages.

How many of us in this body know the number of American citizens murdered in the territory of Carranza in the year 1917–18 and this year of 1919? We do not know because the State Department refuses to give the facts to the press. It does not hesitate to give to the press any fact which will be of assistance and encouragement to the Carranza faction, our declared enemy.

Carranza's bandits made every effort to interfere with the production of Mexican crude oil, which produces the best aviation gasoline. I recall the time when my whole command at the flying school was kept from flying owing to the lack of oil; and to think that we were protecting the very faction that was retarding production, I believe, is sufficient to justify my calling for all of the facts and that we decide what should be done.

I do not desire to justify any one faction in Mexico. I am simply endeavoring to show that if we have the facts before us we could see that the continuance of present conditions is impossible. I hold no brief for Felix Diaz and his faction; still, they do represent an element which can be utilized to bring about law and order in that country. Permit me to read to you parts of the proclamation of Felix Diaz, which proclamation I shall put in the RECORD in its entirety. Felix Diaz, who is represented by Carranza as representing only the picked landlords, accepts the revision of land laws as one of the deepest causes of Mexican interior disturbances.

It is therefore urgent—

He says—

> that these troubles be settled, but not by means of force and going over the legitimate rights of the owners of the lands, but through wise laws and under just indemnification.

I wish to call your attention to what Diaz says as to Carranza's attitude toward this country during the war:

> One of the greatest crimes of the Carranzista Government is its so-called neutrality, as it is only a disguise for the best intelligence between Carranza and Imperial Germany. This union has gone deep into the hearts of the Mexican people, to stir up the old hatred in our history, to the exclusive advantage of the Carranzista faction and the German Empire in the present war, gravely imperiling our national tranquillity. If when nations are led by the impulse of their own passions they err, when they are controlled by the colossal passions of another nation they are on the road to an humiliating catastrophe. Germany has nothing to do with our history, our situation, or our domestic problems. She should leave us alone to our interests, our resentments, and passions; that the use of them belongs only to the Mexican people, to do with them as it pleases. German money has obtained the final point in the corruption of the already rotten Carranzista organization, to the extent that we have practically lost our domestic sovereignty, as it is the Imperial German Government who points out to Carranza the path along which he must lead the all-suffering Mexican people. We must shake off that Teutonic yoke as we must shake off all foreign yoke, being one of the independent and free nations in the world.

I shall put in this entire proclamation, calling your attention that it was dated the 1st of October, 1918. Felix Diaz is not a candidate for President of Mexico; he has no such ambition, but he does want to see his country redeemed, its unfortunate inhabitants relieved, and the future of the country assured. Pelaez does not want to be the President, but he wants to see his country restored. Villa knows that he has no chance of establishing a government for the whole of Mexico, and he is willing to go if Carranza goes and if Diaz goes. While they may differ in certain matters, they all agree that the Carranza Government must go, and they all agree to accept some man in whom they all have confidence to intrust with the rehabilitation of their country.

Let us be frank at this time. A great deal is being said as to the intention of this country taking over Mexico. We do not want to do that. I do not believe that military intervention at this time is necessary. We must protect our border, of course.

If intervention becomes necessary, we will intervene. Just what that would involve I am sure I can not tell. Gen. Leonard Wood says he can go through Mexico, clean it up and establish order, wih 40,000 men, if he is not compelled to use educator bullets. The General Staff's scheme, I am informed, would require 300,000 men. At any rate, it is an unpleasant task, will involve considerable bloodshed, will cost many lives, and take from two to three years. I believe, if we take a firm stand now, that we can convince Mexico that the fantasma has not vanished, that we mean business, that we will protect American lives. To this end I would recommend that the patrol along the border be maintained, that notice be given that no bullets must cross the American line, and that all fighting must be beyond the gun range of American guns placed along the border; that Carranza be informed that he can not expect the friendship, the assistance of this Government a minute longer; that the embargo on arms and ammunition be lifted, with the warning, of course, that the first American life lost or the first taking of property from an American citizen will be dealt with severely, and that we will go down ourselves to see that proper punishment is meted out and proper reparations made; that we serve notice upon all factions that the United States does not intend to interfere and has no intention of interfering in the internal policies of Mexico; that we use our good offices to bring about a conference of Diaz, Pelaez, Angeles, and the leaders of the various factions in Mexico; that they select a man who has not been connected with any of the factions as provisional President; that Villa and Diaz, with Carranza, keep out of the new Government; that a genuine election be called and representatives and a President elected.

In the meantime that we help Mexico in a sincere manner by assisting her in cleaning up the country from disease, pestilence, and famine. Give her the benefit or assistance of our Public Health Service, let our doctors go in and establish better conditions, let our efficient and benevolent Red Cross go in and bring succor where it is needed. Let American engineers go down and assist in the irrigation plan necessary to the utilization of the Mexican soil. Yes; I would go down with beans in one hand and offer help to the Mexican people, but I would be sure to have hand grenades in the other hand, and God help them in case they do not accept our well-intended and sincere friendship. Gentlemen, I sincerely believe that my resolution should be reported favorably from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that we should insist upon getting the facts before us and then you will see that public opinion in this country will be so that it will compel a proper course of the sort suggested being adopted and followed. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. LAGUARDIA was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the leave to extend my remarks, I print the following documents:

EXHIBIT A.

Felix Diaz, commander in chief of the national army of reorganization, and the undersigned, generals, chiefs, and officers in said army, address this proclamation to the Mexican people as a whole, and in a special sense to the following elements:

The members of the extinct national army and navy, without any exception;

The groups in arms against the Carrancismo, whatever their political origins or affiliations may be;

The great masses that form the proletariat of the countryside;

The working classes and those in need;

The landowners;

Those interested in the oil wealth of the country;

The miners, bankers, manufacturers, and merchants;

The Mexican citizens and foreigners exiled from our country;

The clergy;

The foreigners who have interests in our country;

And finally, for special reasons, the Governments of the Allied Nations in the war they wage in the interests of liberty and humanity against the Central Powers.

"The domestic and foreign situation of our country has suffered deep and disturbing changes since the issue of the Acta de Tierra Colorado on February 23, 1916. This fundamental reason makes it imperative the reform of said acta, the sole aim being the salvation of our country. The legitimate constitution of February 5, 1857, has been supplanted through the use of brute force with the spurious of February 5, 1917, by those who, violating all precedents, usurped the rights which the Mexican people can not confer in a different manner than that established by the constitution which was violated.

"Venustiano Carranza, basing his rights on the Carrancista constitution, had himself elected president by his followers in arms—who have shared with him the rich spoils in the plunder of the nation—and, by the force of might, refused to allow the vote to those citizens who were independent or did not belong to his faction.

"Against the ideals of the revolution and the will of the people, he has absorbed and monopolized in his person and by all possible means the executive power of the nation. He first had himself made commander in chief of the revolutionary movement, and when the latter took charge of the public offices Carranza continued as leader during the criminal period which preceded the making of the new constitution. Later on, when the pseudo constitution of Queretaro was framed, he continued as the supreme executive of the nation in order to influence the approaching elections in his favor. Once these were over, disregarding all the electoral rights of the Mexican citizens, he proclaims himself President of the United States of Mexico.

"The just aspirations of the Mexican people to conquer their right to free electoral vote and no reelection of a man in office, which have cost them so much blood and ruin, have been trampled on by Carranza in a manner without precedent in our history. There had never been an instance in which a person consecutively claimed the supreme command of the nation under guise of chief of the revolution, chief of the preconstitutional period, provisional president and president, elected by the might of his followers. Such an enormous outrage is only possible in these abnormal times, when the whole world is upset.

"It is well known in international circles that the so-called ideals of the Carrancismo have always been and still are robbery and plunder, and as the means to accomplish this, exile and assassination. The national treasure has been dissipated, the banks have been robbed and closed, the factories despoiled and set afire, the fields lay barren, commerce has been plundered and later on monopolized in its most productive lines by Carranza followers disguised with the rights of the Federal Army.

"The wealthy class has been driven from their homes, and their goods have been confiscated, to be consumed in the orgies of the Carrancista government.

"The Carrancista plunder was not confined to any one class of people, and to insure that no one would escape, the colossal fraud of the paper money was implanted by force—a calamity that our country in the lowest periods of her national life had never suffered.

"Public education, which is the basis of the greatness of all countries, has been relegated to a municipal function of secondary importance, when the hopes and wishes of the nation and the modern necessities of progress and culture impose its elevation and federalization.

"Our country and all those nations that have a direct bearing in our international life expected that the Carrancismo would have satisfied its passions and hunger of plunder during the terrible preconstitutional period, and that once that period was over and the pseudo constitution of Queretaro was issued, the electoral fraud perpetrated and Carranza in charge of the presidency, an era of relative tranquillity and concord would commence and make life bearable to the people of Mexico. It was also hoped that, with time, things would return to their legal régime. Unfortunately, Carranza and his followers have proven to be more criminal after being endowed with governmental powers than they were as revolutionists. The crimes committed grow in number each day as Carranza has now the organization of a government at his command, adding to his armed followers the civilian forces in his administration. This places him in a better position than before he was elected, to carry out his malevolent designs.

"The Carrancista faction has taken over the Mexican Republic, as if the country were a patrimony coming to it, to the complete exclusion of all the Mexican citizens and the foreigners who are not Carrancistas. Said faction disposes of the national property and the property of private individuals with a freedom that not even their rightful owners would employ; it has closed the doors of the country to all those who had emigrated, not only in fear that their return may increase the number of discontents, but also that it may continue enjoying the possession of their property which has been confiscated during their absence. The despotism of the Carrancista régime has reached such a degree that its consuls refuse to provide passports to Mexican citizens in foreign lands either to return to their own country or to go from one country to another. The object is to keep those Mexican exiles interned in those places, where they may be suffering from their unjust expatriation. The majority of the people belonging to the leading classes, on account of their culture, education, or social position, has been driven out of the country, depriving the country of their cooperation, creating immeasurable harm to the youth of the nation in present and future times.

"The promises of distribution of land have been nothing but a deception with which the popular masses were attracted, so that they might help to the victory of force. Once victory was attained, the Carrancista faction took steps tending toward the delay in the solution of this most urgent and patriotic problem, which in the interests of Mexico demands immediate attention.

"The federal army, heroic and glorious, notwithstanding the grave mistakes of so many of its members, upholding and guaranteeing the individual rights, the honor, the liberty, and lives of all the inhabitants of our interior sovereignty and our exterior independence, was dissolved because the country, misled by the ideas of the revolution, emphatically demanded its extinction, thinking that peace could not be consolidated until this indispensable institution was disarmed and abolished. This has been the gravest error of the Mexican people, as once that the respect and guarantee that this federal army gave them were destroyed the country was left in the hands of outlaws who found no one to oppose them. This valiant and patriotic army, which in union with all the healthy elements of the country is the one called to cooperate in the immense labor of the national reconstruction, has been substituted by convicts, assassins, and robbers, who at the present practice their profession not in the shade of the Carrancista government, but in its name and with its unconditional support for the exclusive advantage of each particular malefactor.

"The Carrancista revolutionary leaders come from the lowest social extraction. However, at the present time they are the richest in the land. They live in an incessant orgie of abject immorality, in palaces that have been confiscated, adorning themselves with jewels that have been obtained by brute force, traveling in stolen automobiles, and throwing away the money which they have robbed from the wealthy classes. Carranza promised the poor people that he would take the riches away from the wealthy to distribute them amongst the needy. Instead he has taken those riches to a greater extent than promised, but he has distributed them amongst his chiefs, while the poor people and even the lower classes of the Carrancista faction are crying out in hunger and indignation.

"Carranza in his desire to rob and plunder has imposed unbearable taxes, violating all economic laws of tributation, suppressing all activities, cruelly oppressing the taxpayers, choking all the national fountains of production, and sinking the whole Republic in the abyss of the most terrible bankruptcy.

"If the persecutions, imprisonments, insults, robberies, exiles, and assassinations had fallen only on the enemies of the revolution, even if they were unjustified, they would at least have an explanation. Unfortunately the immense majority of the victims have been completely innocent. Defenseless women and children have been violated and grossly insulted.

"Foreigners on par with nationals have suffered equal horrors and assaults. The noble and industrious Spanish colony, so identified with our nation, a lover of our country to the extent of thinking of her as a second country, has been atrociously insulted and has suffered criminal attempts because her invincible nobility, her honor, and interests have not humiliated themselves and paid homage to the Carranza bandits. Toward the respectable Spanish colony and toward Spain, our heroic mother, we must only hold filial affection, as in our veins runs her glorious blood and our problems with her of the past are already solved by history. We must also hold toward her glories a love and veneration, and at the same time feel thankful toward those of her children that live amongst us as brothers.

"The Carrancista government has not been satisfied with the terrible catastrophe it has brought to the country in its domestic affairs, but has placed the country in international complications that threaten our respectability and the tranquillity of the nation. It has always acted in extreme ways, most of the time with ignominious tendencies toward subserviency, dragging shamelessly over the ground the sovereignty of the Republic and adopting servile manners in international affairs. When these practices have not produced the desired result, or the stability of the party in power has been threatened because the people will not bear any longer the crimes that it attempts, its policy is changed to an extremely arrogant attitude to mislead the people into giving their support by calling upon their patriotism. It is then that the restless characters on the American border are stirred, developing a number of foolish threats whereby the Carrancismo expects to attain its end. Its conduct in our international difficulties has only served to make worse our domestic calamity.

"One of the greatest crimes of the Carrancista government is its so-called neutrality, as it is only a disguise for the best intelligence between Carranza and Imperial Germany. This union has gone deep into the hearts of the Mexican people to stir up the old hatred in our history, to the exclusive advantage of the Carrancista faction and the German Empire in the present war, gravely imperiling our national tranquillity. If when nations are led by the impulse of their own passions they err, when they are controlled by the colossal passions of another nation, they are on the road to a humiliating catastrophe. Germany has nothing to do with our history, our situation, or our domestic problems. She should leave us alone to our interests, our resentments and passions, that the use of them belongs only to the Mexican people to do with them as it pleases. German money has obtained the final point in the corruption of the already rotten Carrancista organization, to the extent that we have practically lost our domestic sovereignty, as it is the Imperial German Government who points out to Carranza the path along which he must lead the all-suffering Mexican people. We must shake off that Teutonic yoke, as we must shake off all foreign yoke, being one of the independent and free nations in the world.

"The German-Carrancista plot is taking more concrete forms of expression and is appearing on the surface. The intranquillity which the Carranza government in an underhand manner foments along the American border is for the purpose of making the United States maintain a considerable number of forces on the frontier and keeping these forces from giving aid on the European continent. It is meant that, if necessary, the Carranza government induce raids to be made on the American border cities, and to embroil Mexico in a terrible war against the United States in order to hinder the movements and developments of the allied forces.

"Another phase of the plot is that which relates to the problem of the Mexican oil. It is well known that 75 per cent of the oil used by the allied fleets is produced in Mexico. The Germans have plotted to arrange matters with Carranza so that gradually the extraction of oil in Mexico become impossible, and if necessary the wells will be set on fire. In this manner the movements of 75 per cent of those navies will be paralyzed as if that percentage of the allied fleets had been sunk. All these machinations favor only the Carranza government and the German Empire with irreparable sacrifice to the Mexican people. For this reason we wish to open their eyes, that, conscious of their sovereignty, the Mexicans may prevent their being 'rented' or 'sold' by Carranza to the German Empire.

"The above reasons explain why we have judged it just and patriotic to make a general call to the nation and especially to those parties whose interests have suffered the most, in an endeavor to excite them to the immense task of the national reorganization within the scope of their respective activities. It is time that we put an end to the terrible war that is annihilating the living strength of our country; we must stop this fratricidal struggle and set aside the personal sentiments that divide us, the hatred and rancor that destroy and the spirit of vengeance that kills. Let us seek sincerely and without personal interests peace and justice based on true law.

"We have been called 'candid' because in former times we left victory in the hands of an ambitious party that had solemnly promised the pacification of the Republic. However, our conduct is an irrefutable proof of our sincerity and personal disinterestedness. If we had confronted that party to dispute their power, a new revolution would have been kindled, animated by a spirit of mean individual antagonism, and our high ideals and patriotic aims would have been changed into selfish egoism. Those deep perturbations (which we wished to prevent and which, as the whole Nation knows, we positively prevented) the Carrancismo did not wish to prevent nor prevented them, for when within that faction a movement was begun to turn the power over to a group of persons who would unite all the revolutionists in the country the Carrancismo refused to recognize that movement and decided to hold the sway of power for personal benefits and the enrichment of its leaders. In this manner the triumph of the revolution was nothing more than the beginning of another struggle against dictatorship and anarchism.

"As long as the armed groups seek nothing but the chance to plunder and to elevate their chieftains to a position which will allow this plunder, they will only destroy and bleed the country. It is time to leave behind all rancor and spirit of vengeance created by previous political conditions of the country. Let us forget the difference in parties before our fatherland that lies agonizing; let us forget the past and look only toward the future, putting into practice our endeavors to save the nation. The time has come when the country must be divided into two parties—the honest people and the bandits; those who disinterestedly wish to save her and the Carrancismo that robs her, villifies her, insults her, and is killing her. One of these two parties we must choose; no citizen can remain indifferent, for indifference at the present moment is a crime of treason to the nation. Each one of us must either associate himself with the Carrancista hordes or join the ranks of honor and patriotism; there is no other way—either treason or the country.

"As we recognize that the army is the supreme guaranty of the social institutions, the upholder of governments, defender of their interior sovereignty and their exterior independence, we address, first, the members of the extinct national army and navy in the following terms:

NATIONAL ARMY AND NAVY.

"1. Upon the triumph of the movement to which this declaration refers, the rank which the members of the extinct national army and navy had on October 10, 1913—date of the dissolution of the last legitimate Congress—will be officially recognized, provided that they fulfill the following requisites:

"2. The members of the said army and navy, who upon the publication of this manifest are in the service of the Carrancismo, must leave the same within 60 days from the publication of this manifest and join the forces that uphold the movement of reorganization, signing the pledge of loyalty and placing themselves at the service of the general staff. Those who do not fulfill these requisites, at no time and for no reason can they join with any rating the national army and navy.

"3. Those who are not serving the Carrancismo, but who are within the boundaries of the national territory, must join the army of reorganization within four months from the publication of this manifest. If it should be impossible for them to join, they must apply to the nearest representative of our movement and sign the pledge of loyalty, stating the obstacles which make it impossible for them to join, but placing themselves at the orders of the general staff or their superiors in rank in the extinct federal army, which may be commissioned for this purpose.

"4. Those who may find themselves outside of the Republic must join within six months. In case this should be impossible they will proceed to file their pledges of loyalty with any authorized representative of the movement, and remain under orders of the general staff and their superior officers in the federal army, commissioned for this purpose.

"As the call to the men who belong to the national army and navy is not made by an individual, nor has it other aims than that of carrying out the patriotic duty of saving the country from the anarchy to which the Carrancismo has dragged it, it is natural that those who refuse to carry out what the military honor demands will not be admitted—after the struggle, the necessity and opportunity for their services has passed—to form a part of the future national army and navy.

NATIONAL REORGANIZING ARMY.

"(1) The generals, chiefs, and revolutionary officers that constitute the actual national army of reorganization will form the future federal army with the ranks conferred upon them by the general staff. They will have the duties and enjoy the benefits which are given to them by the general ordinance of the army.

"(2) The generals, chiefs, and officers who in the future adhere to the Acta de Tierra Colorada and cooperate with arms in hand to the victory of the movement of reorganization, will be incorporated to the new federal army with the rank acknowledged and conferred upon them by the general staff on the terms previously mentioned.

VARIOUS ARMED GROUPS.

"We cordially invite the various leaders and revolutionary groups that struggle against Carrancismo—without any exclusion and distinction of political beliefs—to confer with us and arrive at a decision mutually favorable that will facilitate the redemption of our unfortunate country.

"Our aims are not selfish, nor do we uphold any of the hated personalisms that are bleeding and dividing the country. On the other hand, we make this call to the national concord, to the political forgiveness, the patriotic forgetfulness of all the rancor brought about in our appalling fratricidal struggle. We therefore feel sure to be able to arrive at an honorable arrangement with all those elements of good will and whose ambition is no other than the good of our country. The groups we are addressing and ours are identified in a fundamental work, which is the annihilation of the Carrancismo—the cause of all the calamities of our nation—in consequence, it will be easy work to arrive at a mutual agreement in our secondary aims and the means of carrying out the work.

TO THE GREAT MASSES THAT FORM THE PROLETARIAT OF THE COUNTRYSIDE.

"One of the broadest, deepest, and most urgent national necessities is the solution of the economic, intellectual, and moral problem of the country people, within which is comprised the heroic and abnegated Indian race.

"The distribution of the lands has been preached as the panacea for all the ills of the country people. But this measure alone and in itself would produce nothing but the ruin of the agricultural regions by the systematic weakening of the Republic. This subject is more complexed than it has been made to appear before the eyes of the misled multitudes. It is indispensable to provide for the enormous masses of disinherited, but, as the measure by itself would not be only insufficient but would work against those masses, it is necessary that it should be accompanied by all the needed measures for the economic, intellectual, and moral improvement of all those masses. Of what use would those lands be without the implements to cultivate them, without the water to irrigate them, without the means of transportation for the outlet of their products? And even all those advantages would be of little value if that class of people were not subjected to a régime of morality and of instruction that might awaken its activities and dissolve its laziness and indifference toward its social improvement.

"Therefore, together with the adequate and opportune distribution of the lands, will be established the instruction and moralizing of the masses of the countryside, and they will be provided with the means for the development of all their activities.

TO THE LANDOWNERS.

"The owners of all large tracts of lands are in the bottom of their hearts avowed enemies of all revolutionary movements that will reform old-established systems not only on account of the large and inevitable damages which they suffer during the struggle but also for the arbitrary manner in which they are threatened to be deprived of their property at the triumph of each revolution. These threats are due to the obstinacy of the foolish masses who are desirous of free distribution, by forcible means, of the riches of the rest of the citizens. If those so-called ideals were ever realized, we would never have peace, because those who to-day were deprived of their goods would be the revolutionists of to-morrow.

"The distribution of the lands is one of the deepest causes of our interior disturbances. It is, therefore, urgent that these troubles be settled, but not by means of force, and going over the legitimate rights of the owners of the lands, but through wise laws and under just indemnifications. The honest government that may hold the confidence of the country and of the foreign nations will count with abundant resources to dedicate them to the solution of this problem, which will be to the pleasure of the unfortunate classes of the countryside, to the benefit of the landowners, and with the approbation of the whole nation. In consequence the landowners must not see in our program a movement of violence to deprive them of their interests, but a movement of just coordination and equality based on an honest respect for the property of everybody.

TO THE VARIOUS GROUPS WHO HAVE INTERESTS IN OUR COUNTRY.

"The banks have been robbed by the Carrancistas, their concessions made void, and they themselves have been illegally closed. As the banks are the most important factors in the credit and the circulation of the riches, and constitute the indispensable institution in the modern life of a nation, it is necessary to repair in all that it may be possible the unjust treatment which they have suffered and to return them their property in accordance with the law.

"Mines, which are some of the most important sources of our riches, have been consumed by the ambition of the Carrancistas, and many times flooded and abandoned. They do not produce at the present time even 20 per cent of their normal production, and the capitalists wisely refuse to work them—although this is against their own interests and the interests of the people who live from working them—because the Carrancismo appropriate all the production of the mines.

"Industries have been stamped out; railroads are in the hands of the Carrancista hordes that work them for the exclusive benefit of their chiefs and against the interests of commerce; trade they have absolutely disregarded. All the branches of the riches of the country and all the social activities are so heavily taxed that the people practically work for the exclusive benefit of the Carrancismo, who is choking the whole nation under the terrible weight of its atrocious exaction.

"We are, therefore, obliged to give to the inhabitants without any distinction full guaranties against the Carrancismo, who is the sworn enemy of the property holders, of all interests of the nation, of her honor, and of her life, so that the nation may begin anew its economical activities and public confidence and tranquillity may be reborn.

CONFISCATION.

"The Carranza revolution has had no other object than to enrich its leaders by taking away the property from its rightful owners. It has, therefore, been an organized movement for robbery, destruction, dishonor, and vengeance. If the enemies of the Carrancismo had been the only ones to be deprived of their property this would have at least a political explanation, although fundamentally wrong, being forbidden by the law. Unfortunately, the confiscations have had no other criterion than that of personal interests, and therefore people who had never mixed in politics and in many cases had spent the larger part of their lives away from Mexico have suffered from these confiscations. This great damage must be repaired as soon as possible, returning immediately to the original owners the property which they had confiscated, no matter what the motive of this confiscation may have been. This property must be taken away from the present holders, who must be judged and sentenced in accordance with the law.

THE OIL PROBLEM.

"The sovereign right which every free country has to decree the taxes on the riches and operations carried on by its inhabitants is irrefutable, but it is also true that that right can not be absolutely arbitrary, nor can it be used to jeopardize, with destruction or confiscation, the right of personal property. Under a guise of national sovereignty it is not possible to deprive citizens and foreigners of a country of that which they lawfully own. Taxes must have a just limit of public usefulness and of the right of property, otherwise they lose their character of taxes and become actual confiscation.

"The Carrancismo has decreed taxes more or less heavy that deeply affect the oil industry in Mexico. This is an enormous damage caused to that branch of our riches, but the situation is made worse by the fact that the Carrancista tribunals do not give justice to the sufferers, who find that they need to appeal for aid through diplomatic influences, to the detriment of our national dignity, because unfortunately in Mexico, at the present time, justice and law do not exist.

"We will endeavor to conciliate the interests of individuals with those of the nation by means of a careful study and application of the wisest and most patriotic laws based on the inalienable right of property and within the greatest respect to interests of persons, so that we can resolve in our own country and without intervention of foreign influences this important problem, avoiding all kinds of confiscation.

TO THE WORKING CLASSES AND THOSE IN NEED.

"Although our country is not essentially industrial, there are regions in which the working class creates already a political and social question that is urgent to solve. It is necessary to shorten the distance between the capitalists and the workingmen so as to leave capital the necessary profits for its work and development and in such a manner as may not be deprived of that which legitimately belongs to it, but careful of the conciliation, welfare, and improvement of the working masses, we will seek the betterment of its living conditions, its instruction and moralizing, the raising of salaries and a reasonable diminishing of working hours, regulating the manner of work within the economical and practical laws prescribed and adopted as convenient to harmonize equally the capitalists and the workingmen.

"But not only the working classes need the benefits of our patriotic endeavors. There is a large mass of needy that must be aided by the Governments by encouraging their union and cooperation to make more effective their social advance and so that their work may bear more satisfactory results. If these masses were abandoned to their own resources, their improvement would be practically impossible or at least exceedingly slow.

TO THE CLERGY.

"The members of the Catholic Church in Mexico have been insulted, dishonored, robbed, tormented, and sent into exile against all principles of humanity and of our own laws, for they have full right to enjoy the liberty and guaranties that those laws offer them, and they must be respected in the way in which those laws demand it.

"We uphold the constitution of 1857; also the laws of reform and all those which legitimately emanate from them; we proclaim the efficient independence between the church and the state, and we are defenders of free creed, within the limit of those same laws and without any sectarian fanaticisms, which are conducent to intolerance and crime.

"The freedom of conscience is sanctioned by our political institutions; in consequence, all the inhabitants have full right to adopt and practice the Catholic religion, or any religion, within the prescribed laws. The use of violence against the ministers of any church for the sole reason of representing that church is a crime punishable according to the codes of our legislature. Therefore, all religions, including the Catholic religion, which has been the only one to have been persecuted, will enjoy the full measure of protection granted by our fundamental law.

TO THE CITIZENS IN EXILE.

"The Carrancismo has made of our country an individual patrimony to such an extent that it enjoys it and destroys it as it pleases and expels or closes the doors of the country to all those nationals or foreigners who are not its accomplices in crime. It was first believed that the exile would end as soon as the American Government would recognize Carranza; later, it was thought at the end of the ignominious period of preconstitution; still later, once the presidential elections were over (so that exiles could not influence the results with their votes), and, finally, on an issuance of amnesty; but this Carranza will never give. It is therefore self-evident that exiles can not return and will never return to their country until the victory of our humanitarian and essentially patriotic movement. It is therefore necessary that each one of you in exile do his duty, cooperating in any and all activities that may allow him to return to the country. It is a sacred duty that you owe to her. Do not remain inactive expecting some mercy that will never arrive from the Carrancismo, or waiting that those who risk their lives to free the country may be able to offer you a safe return, for which you yourselves have not wished to work. We address all those that are capable of acting; those who are not, thereby are already very unfortunate in their exile. Whether the exiles actively cooperate with us (to the best of their ability), helping us to liberate the nation, or refuse us, in an unconditional way, their aid, they will always enjoy full guaranties in those places which our army may occupy and the doors of the country will be open cordially and wide to them as true brothers of ours.

INTERNATIONAL ALLY POLICY.

"We are addressing the Governments of the nations allied in the World War against the imperial Central Powers with two fundamental aims in view. It is necessary that they should know the fraudulent manner in which Carranza had himself elected President. (He was voted into power by the armed forces that support him, using them also to deprive the citizens of their right to vote.) The Allied Governments must be convinced that Carranza is an usurper of the presidency and therefore is not the legitimate representative of our nation. The Carrancismo is the only party responsible for the German-Carrancista plot, and not the Mexican Republic.

"Mexico, on account of its race, education, instruction, ideals, sentiments, and even interests, is deeply pro-Ally. In the gigantic struggle waged to save the most sublime principles of the modern nations, Mexico can not side with the spirit of despotism, of oppression, and the passionate fever of conquest. Mexico must side with those nations that have come forward to the defense of the ideals of equality, liberty, and fraternity among the nations of the world.

"Carranza is treasoning the convictions and sentiments of the Mexican people, giving the whole world the malevolent impression that Mexico is neutral in the present world conflagration. Such neutrality is a sham; it is false, and with it Carranza covers the partiality which he feels toward the German cause, and in this hidden and deceptive manner he is able to cooperate in the devastating work of the Huns without being hindered by the Allies.

"It is unjust that the allied nations should interpret the sentiments of the Mexican people through the work of Carranza, who is the worst enemy that has had our nation in her domestic and foreign tranquillity.

"All the Allied Governments have in their chancelleries irrefutable proofs of the Germano-Carrancista intrigue. Therefore when we address them it is not to inform them of something which they already know but to protest before the whole world and to communicate directly to the Governments of the allied nations that Carranza is treasoning the humanitarian ideals of the Mexican people and unjustly compromising the aims of Mexico. For this reason we appear before the tribunal of international public opinion to remove all doubt and to demand that Mexico be judged and respected according to its own way of thinking and of feeling and on no account in accordance with the unpatriotic conveniences of the Carrancistas.

THE PSEUDO CONSTITUTION OF QUERETARO OF 1917.

"The pseudo constitution of February 5, 1917, is lawfully declared out of existence, as those who issued it were not the legitimate representatives of the Mexican people, were supported in their actions by armed forces, against all legal proceedings, and were elected through electoral fraud, having refused the citizens the right to vote.

"Venustiano Carranza and all other authors and their accomplices in the crime of changing the political constitution of Mexico will be judged and sentenced by competent tribunals and in accordance with the law.

"All decrees, laws, rulings, circulars, appointments, resolutions, and judicial acts made by the Carrancismo from its advent to power to the time of its overthrow are declared void and radically null.

MOTTO OF THE NATIONAL ARMY OF REORGANIZATION.

"The primitive motto of our movement was 'peace and justice,' as embodying the supreme aspirations of the Mexican people, but as subsequently the legitimate Constitution of the Republic has been supplanted and as its reestablishment is the fundamental base of our institutions and the most urgent of our national necessities, henceforth our motto will be 'Constitution of '57, peace and justice.'

ACTA DE TIERRA COLORADA.

"The points treated before do not alter in any way the bases embraced by the Acta de Tierra Colorada; on the contrary, they strengthen and regulate her, and therefore those bases exist in all their vigor, enlarged in the manner described above.

"We honestly and disinterestedly believe that these ideas—which can not be perfect, due to the natural imperfection of human acts—contain an expression of the highest aspirations and deepest necessities of our country.

"We invite all Mexicans of good will to save our country—a country which we love the more on account of her sufferings—and we solemnly protest before the whole nation our sincerity and personal disinterestedness.

DECREE OF GEN. CARRANZA.

Department of the interior.

I, Venustiano Carranza, first chief of the constitutionalist army and depository of the executive power of the Republic of Mexico, taking into consideration—

That on the arrest of the President and Vice President, on the 19th of February, 1913, by ex-Gen. Victoriano Huerta, and the usurpation of public power by the latter, on the 20th of the same month, and immediately thereafter depriving the above-mentioned public officers of their lives, the constitutional order of the Republic was interrupted, and thus the country was deprived of a lawful government;

That the undersigned, in his capacity as constitutional governor of the State of Coahuila, had solemnly taken the oath to observe and cause the general constitution to be observed, and that, complying with this duty and of the above oath, he was inevitably obliged to rise in arms to oppose the usurpation of Huerta and to restore constitutional order in the Republic of Mexico;

That this duty, furthermore, was imposed upon him in a precise and express manner by a decree of the legislature of the State of Coahuila, by which he was categorically directed to repudiate the government of the usurper Huerta and to oppose it by the force of arms until it would be completely overthrown;

That, in view of the occurrence, the undersigned called all patriotic Mexicans to arms, and with the first ones who followed him he framed the plan of Guadalupe, on March 26, 1913, which has served to this day as the banner and by-law of the constitutionalist revolution;

That from the military groups which were formed to oppose Huerta's usurpation the divisions of the northwest, northeast, east, center, and south operated under the leadership of the first chieftainship, perfect harmony existing between this and the former, and complete coordination in the means of action to accomplish the desired purpose; though the same did not occur with the northern division, which, under the command of Gen. Francisco Villa, showed from the beginning private tendencies, and finally severed its connections with the headquarters of the constitutionalist revolution, acting according to its own initiative, to such extent that the first chief does not know to this day, in a great measure, the means by which the above-mentioned general has secured funds and sustained the campaign, the amount of such funds, and the use he may have made of them;

That upon the arrival at the City of Mexico of the victorious revolutionary army it endeavored to properly organize the provisional government, and was getting ready besides to meet the demands of public opinion by a satisfactory solution of the imperative exigencies of social reform needed by the people, when it was confronted with the difficulties which the reaction had been preparing in the bosom of the northern division, in order to frustrate the triumphs reached by the efforts of the constitutionalist army;

That the first chieftainship, anxious to organize the provisional government in accordance with the ideas and tendencies of the men who, with arms in hand, made the constitutionalist revolution, and who, therefore, were intimately cognizant of the ideals which were pursued, called a general convention, to be held in the City of Mexico, composed of generals, governors, and officers in command of troops, to the end that all of them together should decide on a program of government, indicate in a general way such reforms as seemed indispensable for the accomplishment of the social and political redemption of the nation, and would establish the form and time when constitutional order should be restored;

That this purpose had soon to be deferred, because the generals, governors, and officers who attended the military convention in the City of Mexico considered it advisable that there should be representatives at all the meetings of the elements which had taken part in the fight against the usurpation of Huerta, as some of them had abstained from attending, giving as a pretext a lack of guaranties and because of the rebellion which Francisco Villa had already started against the chief's office, and on this account they expressed their desire to be transferred to Aguascalientes, the place they considered more appropriate and having the conditions of neutrality sought by the military convention for the prosecution of their work;

That the members of the convention adopted this determination after they had reiterated to the undersigned their confirmation of his functions as first chief of the constitutionalist revolution and depository of the executive power of the Republic, which investiture he had then relinquished formally, in order to show that he was not animated by undue sentiments of personal ambition, but that, in view of existing difficulties, his cherished aim was that revolutionary action should not be divided, and thus frustrate the fruits of the victorious revolution;

That this first chieftainship made no opposition to the transfer of the military convention to the city of Aguascalientes, although it was intimately persuaded that, far from obtaining the conciliation sought, the separation between the commander of the northern division and the constitutionalist army would become still deeper, because the first chief did not wish to make the impression that he had the deliberate intention of excluding the northern division from the discussion upon matters of the greatest importance; also because he did [not?] wish to appear as refusing that a last effort toward conciliation should be made, and because he believed that it was imperative for the good of the revolution that the true motives of Gen. Villa should be disclosed in an evident manner before national conscience, relieving from error those who in good faith believed in the sincerity and patriotism of Gen. Villa and the group of men who surrounded him;

That so soon as the works of the Aguascalientes convention were initiated the machinations of the Villista agents were laid bare, they having performed the principal rôle at the convention, and the system of threats was felt and unbridled pressure was put to practice against those who, on account of their sense of honor and spirit of independence, opposed the impositions of the commander of the northern division to direct the works of the convention to suit his pleasure;

That, on the other hand, many of the chiefs who attended the Aguascalientes convention did not grasp the importance and true mission of the convention, and as they were men of little or no experience in political matters, their good faith was profited by the malicious agents of Villa, and dragged them to second inadvertently the maneuvering of the northern division, without regard to the cause of the people or even outlining the general thought of the revolution and the program of the preconstitutional government, which was generally desired;

That for the purpose of avoiding a controversy of a purely personal character and the further shedding of blood, the first chieftainship made every possible effort to reach a conciliation, offering to withdraw from power provided a government capable of carrying into effect the social and political reforms demanded by the country should be established. But having failed to satisfy the thirst for power of the northern division, notwithstanding the successive concessions made by the first chieftainship, and in view of the well-defined attitude of a great number of constitutionalist leaders who, repudiating the resolutions adopted by the Aguascalientes convention, ratified their allegiance to the plan of Guadalupe, this first chieftainship was constrained to accept the challenge to fight the reaction led at present by Gen. Francisco Villa;

That the class of the elements on which Gen. Villa is banking, which are the same that prevented President Madero from directing his policy, are therefore politically responsible, in a radical sense, for his downfall. On the other hand, the express declarations made on several occasions by the commander of the northern division advocating the establishment of constitutional order before the social and political reforms demanded by the country take place clearly demonstrate that the insubordination of Gen. Villa is of a strictly reactionary character and contrary to constitutionalist activities, and has for a purpose to frustrate the complete success of the revolution, preventing the establishment of a preconstitutional government intrusted with the enactment and enforcement of the reforms which have been the subject of the struggle which has been raging for the last four years;

That, therefore, it is a duty in behalf of the revolution and the fatherland to continue the revolution started in 1913, pursuing the fight against the new enemies of the liberty of the Mexican people;

That it being imperative, therefore, that the interruption of constitutional order should subsist during this new period of the struggle, the plan of Guadalupe should therefore continue to be in force, as it has been the guidance and banner of it, until the enemy may have been overpowered completely, in order that the constitution may be restored;

That it having been impossible to carry into effect the purposes for which the military convention of October, 1914, was convened, and the purpose of the new fight being, on the part of the reactionary troops commanded by Gen. Villa, to prevent the realization of revolutionary reforms demanded by the Mexican people, the first chief of the revolution is obliged to procure, that at the earliest possible moment there should be put into effect all the laws covering the political and economic reforms which the country requires, enacting the same during the struggle that is to be commenced;

That, therefore, and it being necessary for the plan of Guadalupe to remain in force in its essential part, it is imperative that the Mexican people and the constitutionalist army should clearly know the military ends which are being pursued in the present fight, which are the annihilation of the reaction creeping up, with Gen. Villa at the head, and the establishment of the political and social principles which inspire this first chieftainship, which are the ideals for which the Mexcan people have been fighting during the last four years;

That, therefore, and in accordance with the most general sentiments among the leaders of the constitutionalist army, the governors of the States, and of other collaborators of the revolution, and interpreting the needs of the Mexican people, I, Venustiano Carranza, have seen fit to decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. The plan of Guadalupe of March 26, 1913, shall subsist until the complete triumph of the revolution, and therefore Citizen Venustiano Carranza shall continue in his post as first chief of the constitutionalist revolution and as depository of the executive power of the nation until the enemy is overpowered and peace is restored.

ART. 2. The first chief of the revolution and depository of the executive power of the Republic shall enact and enforce during the struggle all the laws, provisions, and measures tending to meet the economic, social, and political needs of the country, carrying into effect the reforms which public opinion demands as indispensable for the establishment of a régime which will guarantee the equality of Mexicans among themselves, agrarian laws favoring the creation of small landowners, the suppression of latifundia or large landholders, and the restoration to townships of the lands illegally taken from them; fiscal laws tending to establish an equitable system of taxation on real estate; laws tending to improve the condition of the rural laborer, the workingman, the miner, and, in general, of the working classes; the establishment of municipal freedom as a constitutional institution; bases for a new system of organization of the army; amendment of the election laws in order to insure the effectiveness of suffrage; organization of an independent judicial power in the federation as well as in the States: revision of the laws relative to marriage and the civil status of persons; provisions guaranteeing the strict observance of the laws of reform; revision of the civil, penal, and commercial codes; amendment of judicial procedure for the purpose of expediting and causing the effectiveness of the administration of justice; revision of laws relative to the exploitation of mines, petroleum, water rights, forests, and other natural resources of the country, in order to destroy the monopolies created by the old régime and to prevent the formation of new ones; political reforms which will insure the absolute observance of the constitution of Mexico; and, in general, all the other laws which may be deemed necessary to insure for all the inhabitants of the country the effectiveness and full enjoyment of their rights and their equality before the laws.

ART. 3. In order to continue the struggle and to carry into effect the reforms referred to in the preceding article, the chief of the revolution is hereby expressly authorized to convene and organize the constitutionalist army and direct the operations of the campaign; to appoint the governors and military commanders of the States and to remove them freely; to effect the expropriations on account of public utility which may be necessary for the distributions of lands, founding of townships, and other public services; to negotiate loans and issue obligation against the national treasury, indicating the property which shall guarantee them; to appoint and remove freely federal employees of the civil administration and of the States and to fix the powers of each of them; to make, either directly or through the chiefs he may appoint, requisitions for lands, buildings, arms, horses, vehicles, provisions, and other elements of war; and to create decorations and decree recompenses for services rendered to the revolution.

ART. 4. Upon the success of the revolution, when the supreme chieftainship may be established in the City of Mexico and after the elections for municipal councils in the majority of the States of the Republic, the first chief of the revolution, as depository of the executive power, shall issue the call for election of congressmen, fixing in the calls the dates and terms in which the elections shall be held.

ART. 5. Once the federal congress has been installed, the chief of the revolution shall render an account before it of the use he may have made of the powers with which he is vested hereby, and he shall especially submit the reforms made and put into effect during the struggle, in order that congress may ratify them, amend them, or supplement them, and to the end that those which it may see fit may be raised to the rank of constitutional precepts before the reestablishment of constitutional order.

ART. 6. The federal congress shall convene the people to the election of president of the Republic, and as soon as this takes place the first chief of the revolution shall deliver to the president elect the executive power of the nation.

ART. 7. In case of absolute default of the present chief of the revolution—and in the meantime the generals and governors proceed to the election of the person who is to take his place—the chief office shall be temporarily filled by the commander of the army corps at the place where the revolutionary government may be the time the default of the first chief occurs.

DECLARATION TO THE NATION.

Declaration to the nation by the first chief of the constitutionalist government of Mexico and depository of the executive power of the Republic:

At last, after five years of struggle brought about by the long régime of oppression, which kept alive and aggravated the economic and social unbalanced conditions of the colonial era, the revolution is about to end, overpowering the enemy and establishing definitely the economic reforms and political reforms, which constitute its purpose and which are the only ones which can insure the peace emanating from the welfare of the majority, from equality before the law, and from justice.

The revolution has had the instinctive and generous sympathy of free countries, precisely because its aim has not been the mere change of personnel of the administration, but the complete substitution of a régime of oppression by a régime of freedom. The struggle has been a long one because the impatience of the revolutionaries to attain victory in 1911 gave room to the compromise with the elements of the old régime at Ciudad Juarez. From that moment those elements, accepted so easily and kindly, began their work of undermining within the revolutionary midst itself the prestige and authority of the men who a short time later were elevated to power by the free vote of the people. President Madero found himself in the impossibility of realizing the reforms demanded by the people; first, because within his own government almost the whole personnel of the old régime had remained, and, second, because he had to devote his whole time to fight that same old régime which had successfully risen in arms with Reyes, Orozco, and Felix Diaz, and which fomented at the same time that it vitiated the rebellion of Zapata. The reaction having been unable, in spite of the above, to suppress the reform tendencies of the new régime, it decided that the federal army should betray the legitimate government of the Republic. Treason was carried into effect by Gen. Huerta under the pretext of saving the City of Mexico from the horrors of war; and, with the cooperation of a group of foreigners favored by the old régime and who surrounded Henry Lane Wilson, the President and Vice President were assassinated and, due to the complicity or weakness of the other powers, the nation was left without a constitutional representative. Then I, as governor of the State of Coahuila, and in obedience to the constitutional provisions articles 121 and 128 of our fundamental charter, assumed the representation of the Republic in the terms in which the constitution itself vests me with this right, and supported by the people which rose in arms to regain its liberty. In fact, the above-mentioned articles provide the following:

"Every public officer, without exception, prior to his taking possession of his charge, shall render an oath that he will sustain the constitution and the laws emanating therefrom. This constitution shall not fail in force or vigor, even though on account of rebellion its observance may be interrupted. In the case that pursuant to a public disturbance a government contrary to the principles sanctioned by the constitution may be established, as soon as the people regains its freedom, its observance shall be reestablished, and, according to it and to the laws which by virtue of it may have been enacted, those who may have figured in the government emanated from the rebellion shall be tried as well as those who may have cooperated in the movement."

After overpowering the rebellion and usurpation of Huerta, and before the constitutionalist army reached the City of Mexico, the reactionaries, faithful to their old procedure, began to mingle in our ranks and to corrupt those who ought to have given their support to this government, determining as a result the repudiation of it by Gen. Villa and the formation of factions whose chiefs felt encouraged by the presence of foreign representatives who were with them.

When our forces left the City of Mexico, pursuant to a military and political plan, it was thought that the constitutionalist government had lost the support of the people and with it its prestige and force, and that it would follow the course of previous trespassers of public power, but the apparent victory of the reaction headed by Francisco Villa was still more ephemeral than the one obtained by the usurpation of Gen. Huerta, and to-day, after the greatest and most definite victories militarily obtained by the army of the people in various parts of the country, I can say to my countrymen that the constitutionalist government has control of over seven-eighths of the national territory; that it is organizing public administration in 20 out of 27 States of the Republic and in more than half of the other 7 States; that it controls all the maritime ports on the Gulf and on the Pacific Ocean, with the exception of Guaymas, and all the ports of entry on the northern and southern frontiers, with the exception of Piedras Negras, Ciudad Juarez, and Nogales; that more than thirteen million of the fifteen which represent the population of the country—that is to say, nine-tenths of the total population of the Republic—are governed by the administration I preside; that day after day the factions are being routed and dispersed, their offensive action being limited at present to acts of brigandage, and that within a short time the occupation of the City of Mexico will contribute to make the action of the constitutionalist government more harmonious and efficient in all the territory of the Republic. Therefore, our country is nearing the end of its revolution and the consolidation of a definite peace, based on conditions of welfare and justice.

In the midst of the greatest difficulties and within that which may be humanely possible, the constitutionalist government has complied with its duties and has extenuated in behalf of the people the hardships of war, either forbidding the exportation of articles of prime necessity or adopting measures of practical effect to facilitate the acquisition of the same for the benefit of the poor; it has afforded guaranties and given protection to the inhabitants within the territory controlled by the constitutionalist forces, all of whom live a life of normal activity; it has prevented and punished the faults and abuses growing out of the state of social disturbance, which, lamentable as they may be, neither because of their number nor their importance, can be considered as characteristic feature of a governmental régime. I am the first one to deplore the privations which the Mexican people have had to suffer as a result of the war, which constitute one of the many sacrifices the people have to pass through in order to conquer their liberties; but I am decided to employ all the means which may be at the reach of the government to comply with the work of humanity demanded by the circumstances. Fortunately, the recent victories over the factions enlarge the sphere of action of the constitutionalist government and facilitate the compliance of the duties which all Governments have with regard to their constituents to afford guaranties to the inhabitants and to procure the welfare of the masses.

With regard to our foreign relations, notwithstanding that one of my first acts was to address a note by telegraph to the State Department of the United States of America apprising it of my capacity in front of the rebellion and the usurpation, one of the difficulties which has retarded our labors has been the lack of understanding between the government I have the honor to represent and the Governments of other nations, especially that of the United States.

The great interests of the old régime have created a real system of falsehoods and slander against this government, spreading them day after day through the channel of the powerful journals of the American "cientifico" press, which reach the ear of the press of the world, with the object of deforming before the opinion of other nations the procedure and the tendencies of the Mexican revolution; the same interests have used their influence to have false reports rendered to the Governments of other countries, and especially so with regard to the United States, whenever they have endeavored to form judgment concerning the Mexican situation. The constitutionalist government has been deprived of the facilities to make any rectifications against such reports, because it has been denied the opportunity and the means incidental to diplomatic relations between one country and another.

We feel that we are at the present time in condition to overcome this last difficulty, because the constitutionalist government is now in fact in definite possession of the sovereignty of the country; and the legitimate army of sovereignty is the essential condition to be borne in mind when deciding upon the recognition of a government, if as we expect it and desire it in behalf of the Mexican people and of the foreign residents of this country, the Governments of other nations recognize the constitutionalist government, this act of justice will afford it an efficient moral assistance, not only to strengthen the friendly relations which Mexico has always maintained with those nations and be able to discuss their common affairs conciliating their mutual interests, but also to secure a more speedy consolidation of peace to establish a constructive constitutional government, supported by the reforms and the program of the revolution, whose aims are the greater good of the greater number.

I am therefore of the opinion that the time has come to call the attention of the warring factions which are still engaged in armed opposition against the constitutionalist government, to the futility of their attitude, because of the recent and definite victories gained by our army, as well as because of the conviction they must have of our sincerity and capability to carry into realization the ideals of the revolution. Therefore, I appeal to those factions to submit to the constitutionalist government in order to expedite the reestablishment of peace and to consummate the work of the revolution. With a view to realizing the above-mentioned purposes, I have deemed proper to inform the nation upon the political conduct to be observed by the constitutionalist government, in the performance of the program of social reform contained in the decree of December 12, 1914.

First. The constitutionalist government shall afford to foreigners residing in Mexico all the guaranties to which they are entitled according to our laws, and shall amply protect their lives, their freedom, and the enjoyment of their rights of property, allowing them indemnities for the damages which the revolution may have caused to them, in so far as such indemnities may be just and which are to be determined by a procedure to be established later. The government shall also assume the responsibility of legitimate financial obligations.

Second. The first concern of the constitutionalist government shall be to reestablish peace within the province of law and order, to the end that all the inhabitants of Mexico, both native and foreign, shall equally enjoy the benefits of true justice and be interested in cooperating to the support of the government emanating from the revolution. The commission of crimes of the common order shall be punished. In due time an amnesty shall be enacted in keeping with the necessities of the country and the situation, which in no way shall exempt those under it of the civil responsibilities they may have incurred.

Third. The constitutionalist laws of Mexico, known under the name of laws of reform, which establish the separation of the church and the state and which guarantee the individual right of worship in accordance with his own conscience and without offending public order, shall be strictly observed; therefore, no one shall suffer in his life, freedom, and property because of his religious beliefs. Temples shall continue to be the property of the nation according to laws in force, and the constitutionalist government shall again cede for the purposes of worship those which may be necessary.

Fourth. There shall be no confiscation in connection with the settlement of the agrarian question. This problem shall be solved by an equitable distribution of the lands still owned by the Government; by the recovery of those lots which may have been illegally taken from individuals or communities; by the purchase and expropriation of large tracts of land, if necessary; by all other means of acquisition permitted by the laws of the country. The constitution of Mexico forbids privileges, and therefore all kinds of properties, regardless of who the owners may be, whether operated or not, shall in the future be subject to the proportional payment of a tax in accordance with a just and equitable valuation.

Fifth. All property legitimately acquired from individuals or legal Governments, and which may not constitute a privilege or a monopoly, shall be respected.

Sixth. The peace and safety of a nation depends from the clear understanding of citizenship. Therefore, the Government shall take pains in developing public education, causing it to spread throughout the whole country, and to this end it shall utilize all cooperation rendered in good faith, permitting the establishment of private schools subject to our laws.

Seventh. In order to establish the constitutional government, the Government by me presided shall observe and comply with the provisions of articles 4, 5, and 6 of the decree of December 12, 1914, which reads as follows:

"Article 4. Immediately upon the success of the revolution and the reestablishment of the first chieftainship in the City of Mexico, and after the elections for municipal councils in the majority of the States of the Republic, the first chief of the revolution, as the depository of the executive power of the nation, shall convene the people to elections for members of the Federal Congress, fixing in the call the dates and terms in which such elections shall take place.

"Article 5. Immediately after the installation of the Federal Congress the first chief of the revolution shall render an account before it of the use he may have made of the powers with which he is hereby invested, and he shall especially submit to it the reforms which may have been enacted and made effective during the struggle, to the end that Congress may ratify them or amend them or complete them, and in order that it may give the vigor of constitutional provisions to those which ought to have such character prior to the establishment of constitutional order.

"Article 6. The Federal Congress shall convene the people to the election of President of the Republic, and as soon as this takes place the first chief of the revolution shall deliver to the President elect the executive power of the nation."

SECRETARY OF WAR TO SECRETARY OF STATE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 26, 1916.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Referring further to your letter of January 17, 1916, stating that the Department of State has been directed by the President to prepare an answer to Senate resolution dated January 6, 1916, in regard to the Mexican situation, and requesting that a statement be prepared by this department respecting the orders given to Gen. Funston for the protection of American lives and property on the Mexican border, together with any pertinent facts concerning the occupation and evacuation of Vera Cruz, Mexico, by the forces of the United States, I beg leave to advise you that the records of the department show as follows:

1. MEXICAN BORDER.

2. OCCUPATION AND EVACUATION OF VERA CRUZ, MEXICO.

Vera Cruz, Mexico, having been, by direction of the President, occupied by the naval forces of the United States, instructions were issued on April 23, 1914, to the commanding general Second Division, Texas City, Tex., to cause the reinforced Fifth Brigade to embark as soon as practicable on the Army transports Sumner, McClellan, Kilpatrick, and Meade, and to proceed at once to Vera Cruz.

On April 24, 1914, the four regiments of Infantry of the Fifth Brigade, together with Company E, Second Battalion of Engineers, and Field Hospital No. 3, a total of 182 officers and 3,047 enlisted men, sailed from Galveston, Tex., under the command of Brig. Gen. Funston, United States Army, and arrived in Vera Cruz Harbor on April 28, 1914, and disembarked. On April 26, 1914, the First Battalion of the Fourth Field Artillery sailed from Texas City for Vera Cruz on the chartered transport Satilla to join Gen. Funston's command.

On April 26, 1914, orders were issued to Gen. Funston, in compliance with instructions received from the President, upon arrival at Vera Cruz, to relieve the Navy of its duties ashore incident to the occupation and control of the city of Vera Cruz and its environs. Gen. Funston was advised on the same date that pursuant to the orders of the President the First Brigade, United States Marine Corps, would be placed under his command for service with the Army.

On April 29, 1914, the headquarters, band, and detachment of the First Battalion, Fourth Field Artillery, and Troops I and K, Sixth Cavalry, sailed from Galveston for Vera Cruz on the chartered transport San Marcos; and on April 30, 1914, Company D, Signal Corps, sailed for Vera Cruz on the naval transport Esperanza.

Gen. Funston reported taking over from the Navy the command at Vera Cruz on the afternoon of April 30, 1914.

A military government was established by General Orders, No. 3, Headquarters United States Expeditionary Forces, May 2, 1914. This order set forth the principle that the government established thereby would continue the system to which the people of Vera Cruz were accustomed, in so far as consistent with military control, and from that date until the evacuation the Army continued to administer the civil affairs of the city.

The executive branches of the military government established by the general order cited above consisted of the following:

The office of the provost marshal general.

The office of the treasurer.

The customs service, including the Lighthouse Service, to which was later added the pilot service.

The United States mail agency and the general post office.

Each of these branches was placed in charge of an officer of the Army, except the customs service, which was administered by Commander H. O. Stickney, United States Navy, as administrator of customs and captain of the port, and the United States mail agency and the general post office, which were administered by Mr. H. M. Robinson, an official of the Post Office Department, sent to Vera Cruz for the purpose.

Prior to the evacuation, instructions were issued to Gen. Funston to bring with him to the United States all funds in his possession from whatever source derived, both United States funds and Mexican customs receipts and taxes. He was also instructed to bring with him all the records, accounts, and money papers necessary to establish the integrity and accuracy of his financial and other administration, and to make an inventory of all goods in the customhouse, keeping the original of such inventory and leaving a copy with the American consul at Vera Cruz. Gen. Funston was also authorized to leave with the latter such copies of accounts or other data as might be required by whomsoever might continue the government of the city.

On November 14, 1914, as the result of an announcement issued by the State Department on November 13, 1914, Gen. Funston was directed to make all preparations to leave Vera Cruz Monday, November 23, 1914.

On November 20, 1914, Gen. Funston was instructed to evacuate Vera Cruz on the date specified above, viz, Monday, November 23, 1914.

On November 23, 1914, Gen. Funston advised the department that he would embark his command at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of that day on the transports Sumner, Kilpatrick, Cristobal, McClellan, Kansan, Antilla, City of Memphis, Denver, and San Marcos.

On November 26, 1914, Gen. Funston reported the arrival of his command at Galveston, Tex.

Subsequently to his arrival at Galveston, Gen. Funston reported that the Mexican funds brought with him to the United States, together with the money papers pertaining therto, had been placed for safe-keeping in the strong room of the First National Bank at Galveston, storage room for all other records of the military government of Vera Cruz having been provided by the depot quartermaster at Galveston. In this connection Gen. Funston suggested the advisability of sending the Mexican funds and the records of the treasurer's office to the Subtreasury at New Orleans, La., for safe-keeping. Upon receipt of that suggestion, the department communicated at once with the Treasury Department with a view to ascertaining as to whether it would be practicable to place these funds and records in the Subtreasury at New Orleans as suggested, and the Treasury Department having signified its willingness to have the funds and records so transferred, Maj. Blanton Winship, judge advocate, United States Army, who had immediate charge of these funds and records, was advised accordingly.

On January 1, 1915, Maj. Winship reported that he had on that date shipped to the Subtreasury at New Orleans, La., one field safe, sealed, containing 1,539,051.20 Mexican pesos, and the books and records pertaining to the military treasurer's office, together with one sealed wooden box containing 1,065,000 Mexican pesos, or a net total of 2,604,051.20 pesos.

On January 12, 1915, the department advised the Secretary of State of the transfer of the Mexican funds and records, as set forth above.

Sincerely, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The CHAIRMAN. There are remaining 10 hours and 16 minutes of general debate—298 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 318 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in his address to the House upon the bill now before the committee, stated on July 8, among other things, the following:

And let me add for 20 years the Government of the United States has treated and taxed everything that contained more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol as intoxicating liquor, and has treated everything below that as nonintoxicating.

I want to call the attention of the House to some evidence showing that the Government has not done anything of the kind by reading to you the testimony given by Mr. Gaylord, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on July 8, the same day that the gentleman from Minnesota made his speech in the House.

Mr. Gaylord said that the Government had not decided what was not intoxicating as between beverages or between near beers, or such, but that the sole thing they had decided was whether or not the one or the other was a beverage.

In other words, he says that when the near beers came on the market and they were a matter of consideration by the Internal Revenue Bureau "we," said Mr. Gaylord, "recognized the fact that these near beers were not contemplated to be taxed on the same basis as beer; but at the same time our interest was to save the revenue, and after a great deal of argumentation and discussion covering many months—I should say more than a year—the then commissioner decided that if the resultant products contained less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol they would be considered not fermented liquors within the meaning of the law requiring them to pay a tax, and manufacturers would not be liable to the beer tax or a special tax as a dealer in malt liquors."

Mr. Gaylord further said:

The standard was not reached at all by considering really whether that was or was not intoxicating.

In other words, gentlemen, the Treasury Department has only considered these matters of 1½ per cent of alcohol or 2 per cent or 2¾ per cent upon the question of taxation, whether the one was fermented or not fermented, and the Treasury Department—the Internal Revenue Bureau—has not rendered any decision to the effect that beer containing 2¾ per cent is intoxicating.

That is a question of fact, and one that this Congress can not decide, but it is a matter to be determined by the courts and by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as to what amount of alcohol renders a beverage intoxicating.

Mr. Chairman, in that connection I have here some decisions from the Internal Revenue Bureau covering this very important question. I do not want to take the time to read them, but I want the privilege of having them inserted in the RECORD. I did not rise for the purpose of making any speech, but simply to call to the attention of the committee this statement of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee as being not well founded and not in accordance with the facts and the decisions of the Treasury Department. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a part of my remarks these extracts from various Treasury decisions in re malt liquors, brewers, taxes, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print as a part of his remarks the extracts from the Treasury decisions referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Here is the language I used:

And let me add for 20 years the Government of the United States has treated and taxed everything that contained more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol as intoxicating liquor, and has treated everything below that as nonintoxicating.

Is not that what they do?

Mr. DYER. No; it is not. They do not tax them as intoxicating liquors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. IGOE. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DYER. Replying to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I want to say that the Treasury Department's decisions are not on the question of intoxicating liquors at all, but upon the question of fermented liquors. If it is a beer, it pays a beer tax, and if it is a near beer it pays a different tax. The Treasury Department has not decided that beer containing more than one-half of 1 per cent is intoxicating. The decisions I am incorporating as a part of my remarks are only to bear that out, and the testimony of Mr. Gaylord, the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in testifying before the Senate committee July 8, 1919, a stenographic copy of which I hold in my hand, also makes the same statement, and I say that is the best authority upon what the Internal-Revenue Department has decided and the opinion that it holds.

The following are the decisions referred to:

EXTRACTS FROM VARIOUS TREASURY DECISIONS IN RE MALT LIQUORS, BREWERS' TAXES, ETC.

The following decision, while not bearing directly on so-called temperance beer, is important as a ruling by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue interpreting the phrase "root beer and other small beer":

Special, No. 102.

RELATIVE TO THE LIABILITY TO TAX OF BREWERS AND RECTIFIERS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 17, 1871.

Paragraph 17, section 79, act of June 30, 1864, as amended by section 9, act of July 13, 1866, provides that "brewers shall pay $100. Every person, firm, or corporation who manufactures fermented liquors of any name or description for sale from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be deemed a brewer: Provided, That any person, firm, or corporation who manufactures less than 500 barrels per year shall pay the sum of $50."

It is believed that all fermented liquors manufactured in this country for sale are made from malt or from some substitute therefor, and it is therefore held that every person making fermented liquors of any nature or description is liable to pay special tax as a brewer, and must be so assessed whether the liquor produced by him is subject to tax or not. Any person claiming exemption from this tax by reason of not using malt or any substitute therefor in making his fermented liquor may appeal from the assessment by application to this office to abate the same, when the question of his liability will be carefully examined.

Section 48, act of July 13, 1866, as amended March 2, 1867, provides "that there shall be paid on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a tax of $1 for every barrel containing not more than 31 gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity, or for any fractional part of a barrel, which shall be brewed or manufactured and sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States."

All fermented liquors manufactured in this country, so far as known to this office, are similar fermented liquors to beer, lager beer, ale, and porter, and therefore all fermented liquors brewed or manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, are held to be subject to this tax, except such as are included in the exemption contained in this act of March 2, 1867, exemption "root beer and other small beer."

This exemption is held to apply only to such fermented liquors as contain not to exceed 2½ per cent alcohol, as root beer and those beers originally known as small beer do not contain exceeding this percentage of alcohol. Fermented liquors containing not to exceed 2½ per cent alcohol are not susceptible of being marketed in large packages, but are necessarily put up in bottles, so that on opening the quantity exposed to the action of the air will be consumed before becoming spoiled. Stronger liquors, susceptible to being marketed in casks, are ordinarily marketed in that way because of the greater expense of bottling. It is generally true, therefore that fermented liquors marketed in bottles are of a less alcoholic strength than 2½ per cent, and uniformly true that that which is marketed in casks contains a greater percentage of alcohol than 2½ per cent should be subject to tax. It is possible, of course, to put up the stronger liquors in bottles for the market, but an examination of the quality compared with beer known to come within the class of small beers will enable the officer to determine whether it is subject to tax or not.

All fermented liquor containing more than 2½ per cent alcohol brewed or manufactured and sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States must be put up and stamped as required by the act of July 13, 1866, and any person feeling himself aggrieved by such taxation may make application to this office to have the same refunded.

(There follows consideration of the liability of rectifiers, etc.)

A. PLEASANTON,
Commissioner.

(Decisions under war-revenue act of June 13, 1898.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1918.

SIR: In reply to a letter addressed to this office by one of your constituents, Mr. James H. Bingham, of Lawrence, Mass., to which you call attention in your letter of the 17th instant, asking for a ruling with reference to the beverage called "hop beer," which is to "contain 1 per cent or less of alcohol," you will please inform him that as the first paragraph of section 3244, Revised Statutes, requires that every person shall be regarded as a brewer who "manufactures fermented liquors of any name or description for sale from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor," if he should manufacture a fermented liquor from hops and sugar which resembles in general character, taste, appearance, etc., weiss beer (weiss beer being a fermented liquor made from malt, and therefore being subject to the tax imposed upon beer by the provisions of the war-revenue act, notwithstanding the fact that its alcoholic strength is usually very small, sometimes being but 1 per cent), this hop beer must be regarded as having been made from a substitute for malt within the meaning of the statute. And if he makes it for sale he must give bond and pay special tax as a brewer and special tax as a malt-liquor dealer for selling it in bottles, and also pay tax on this beer under the first section of the war-revenue act of June 13, 1898.

A genuine "root beer" or "spruce beer"—that is, a beer made from roots, herbs, or bark, or extracts thereof, with sugar—is not a similar fermented liquor to weiss beer or to any other of the fermented malt liquors enumerated in section 3339, Revised Statutes, and therefore is not regarded as made from a substitute for malt; and the manufacturer of it is not required to pay tax thereon or special tax as a brewer and malt-liquor dealer for making and selling it.

Respectfully, yours,

C. W. WILSON,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. W. S. KNOX, Lawrence, Mass.

"SPECIAL TAX—BEERINE."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1901.

SIR: Your letter of the 26th ultimo has been received, inclosing a formula for the manufacture of a beverage called "beerine." From this formula it appears that the beverage in question is made in part of fermented malt liquor (lager beer), and that "it is like a light table beer and should be handled as such and not like common soda water." This being the case, the beverage must be regarded as similar to weiss beer, and the manufacturer of it must be required to pay special tax as a brewer and tax on this "beerine," and other persons engaged in selling it must be required to pay special tax as malt-liquor dealers.

Respectfully,

ROBERT WILLIAMS,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. H. L. REMMEL,
Collector Internal Revenue,
Little Rock, Ark.

SPECIAL TAX—BARLEY BREW OR BOK ALE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., August 12, 1903.

GENTLEMEN: A sample of a beverage submitted to this office by your representative, imported by you into this country and sold under the name of "barley brew or bok ale," has been analyzed by the chemist here, who reports to this office under date of the 10th instant that it contains 0.53 per cent of alcohol by volume, 0.42 by weight, and 0.48 per cent of total solid matter, and that "while it has, in general, the appearance and flavor of a malt liquor," it is rather an imitation of a malt liquor than the thing itself.

In view of the results thus shown by the chemist's analysis, this office holds that the beverage in question, put upon the market in the precise condition of the sample herein described, is not among those fermented liquors enumerated in section 3339, Revised Statutes of the United States, and that therefore tax is not required thereon, nor the special tax of a dealer in malt liquor for its sale, under the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Respectfully,

ROBERT WILLIAMS, Jr.,
Acting Commissioner.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE COMMISSIONER,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1905.

AMERICAN BREWERS' REVIEW CO.,
Chicago, Ill.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 19th instant has been received, relating to a beverage made from malt or from some substitute for malt, and fermented, and stating that "the question arises frequently among brewers what is the limit of alcohol content that makes the beverage intoxicating; that is to say, from the legal point of view."

The intoxicating character of such a beverage is important and material under the prohibitory liquor laws of a State or Territory, but is not material under the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

A fermented liquor made from malt—for example, weiss beer—may contain so small an amount of alcohol (say 1½ to 1 per cent or less) as to entitle it to be regarded as "nonintoxicating" under the local prohibitory laws, but this fact does not relieve the brewer of this beverage from the necessity of giving bond and paying special tax as a brewer under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, as well as paying tax on this beer.

As to the alcoholic limit below which in any such beverage you say "there is a widespread impression that 2 per cent by volume constitutes this limit," there is no basis for this impression, unless it be in the fact that the act of March 2, 1867, exempted small beer from the tax on fermented liquors under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, as they then stood, but did not define small beer, thus leaving it to this department to lay down a rule by which small beer should be distinguished from other beer on which the tax was imposed. This was done by special No. 102, issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, May 18, 1871, wherein the exemption as to small beer was "held to apply only to such fermented liquors as contain not to exceed 2½ per cent alcohol."

The later provisions of the internal-revenue laws of the United States superseding this act of 1867, and subsequently incorporated in the Revised Statutes of the United States in 1873, omitted this exempting provision, and since then there has been no such exemption as to any fermented liquor made from malt or from any substitute for malt; and now, under these laws, every fermented liquor, the main ingredient of which is malt or a substitute for malt, such as rice or grain of any kind, or sugar, or molasses, or any other material that may be found to take the place of malt, is held to be subject to the tax imposed by these laws on ale, beer, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, and the manufacturers thereof are required to give bond and pay special tax as brewers and dealers therein special tax as malt liquor dealers.

There are, however, beverages manufactured and sold which consist mainly of water carbonated, but by the addition of a small quantity of an "extract" made of tax-paid beer, are given the flavor, taste, and appearance of malt liquor, but contain not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. The settled ruling is that where this quantity of alcohol (one-half of 1 per cent) is not exceeded in any such imitation beer, it does not come within the notice of the internal-revenue laws of the United States, and therefore special tax is not required to be paid for its manufacture and sale.

Respectfully,

ROBERT WILLIAMS, Jr.,
Acting Commissioner.

(T. D. 1193, volume 10.)

In this decision a sample of "hop-ale" was analyzed in the office of the commissioner on May 11, 1907, and was found to contain 0.85 per cent of alcohol by volume. The decision continues:

"In this and other cases where the alcoholic content has not greatly exceeded fifty one-hundredths per cent, this office holds that special-tax liability begins with the first day of the month in which the earliest sample found to contain more than 0.50 per cent was taken for analysis, and the stamp-tax liability begins on the date such sample was taken."

Respectfully,

JOHN G. CAPERS,
Commissioner.

Mr. E. E. BUTLER,
Collector Second District, Bristol, Tenn.

(T. D. 1194, volume 10.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1907.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of the 27th ultimo, requesting a copy or statement of the ruling of this office as to beerine and similar beverages, you are informed that the ruling is that a beverage which has an appreciable alcoholic content, caused by the addition thereto or use in the manufacture of distilled spirits or wine, can not be manufactured without the payment of special tax as rectifier, or sold without payment of special tax as liquor dealer. If the beverage has an alcoholic content of more than one-half of 1 per cent, derived from fermented malt liquors added thereto or used in process of manufacture, the producer must pay special tax as brewer, tax on his product as a fermented liquor in which substitute for malt is used, and sellers of the beverage or product must pay special tax as malt-liquor dealers.

Respectfully,

JOHN G. CAPERS,
Commissioner.

(T. D. 1307, volume 11.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1908.

GENTLEMEN: This office is in receipt of your letter of the 31st ultimo, relative to the manufacture of soft drinks from malt and hops and calling attention to previous rulings of this office as to the requirements of tax on a fermented liquor made from malt, regardless of the percentage of alcohol contained, and as to the nonrequirement of special tax for the sale of beverages containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

In reply you are advised that after careful consideration I have reached the conclusion that, while section 3339, Revised Statutes, requires the payment of the tax of $1 per barrel on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, the practical administration of the law necessitates the fixing of a point below which the alcoholic content is too inconsiderable to class the beverage as either of the liquors enumerated above, or similar thereto, or to bring same within the consideration of the internal-revenue laws. The practice and rulings of this office have already fixed this point as one-half of 1 per cent in the case of sales of beverages of this character, and I see no sufficient reason for making a distinction between the manufacturer and dealer in this class of beverages. It is therefore held that beverages containing not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume do not come within the consideration of the internal-revenue laws either as to manufacture or sale.

Respectfully,

JOHN G. CAPERS, Commissioner.

(NOTE.—This decision makes the limit one-half of 1 per cent alcohol. Later decisions and present practice require less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol.)

(T. D. 1345, volume 11.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1908.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 13th instant your are informed that this office has not approved the manufacture of soft drinks or so-called beer containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol upon the premises of a regular brewery, for the reason that such manufacture must necessarily be subject to rigid internal-revenue supervision, and would doubtless prove a fruitful source of annoyance both to the manufacturer and to the revenue officers.

Respectfully,

ROBERT WILLIAMS, Jr.,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. ———, Omaha, Nebr.

(T. D. 1360, volume 11.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1908.

SIR: Referring to your conference with this office relative to the manufacture of so-called "temperance beer" on the premises of a regular brewery, I have the honor to advise you that, as stated in T. D. 1345, this office has not approved the manufacture of soft drinks and untaxable beverages on the premises of a brewery producing taxable fermented liquors, for the reason that such practice would necessarily be subjected to close supervision, and would probably result in much annoyance both to the manufacturer and to revenue officers.

There is, however, no provision of law or regulations which specifically prohibits such practice, and if brewers undertake to manufacture such a beverage it is desirable that the position of this office be clearly understood.

T. D. 1307, holding that a beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is not taxable as a fermented liquor, is based upon the belief, reached after careful examination of numerous samples submitted to this office, that such a beverage, made from a wort in which such a small quantity of malt or other material is used that the product when fully fermented does not contain one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, or made from a wort containing ordinary amounts of malt or other material and only slightly fermented, does not resemble any of the fermented liquors enumerated in the statute imposing a tax on such liquors sufficiently closely to be classified as such.

The manufacture of any fermented mash, wort, or wash, and the separation by any process of the alcoholic content therefrom, except upon the premises of a registered distillery, is prohibited by section 3282, Revised Statutes, but a proviso to the section expressly exempts fermented liquors from its provisions.

It is therefore held that the manufacture of an ordinary beer and the reduction of the alcoholic content to less than one-half of 1 per cent by boiling in the open air, or by any other process, is prohibited, unless the product is brought within the exemption of the proviso by being taxed as a fermented liquor, regardless of its alcoholic content, but such product, containing less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, may be sold by retailers without the payment of special tax.

Brewers who manufacture a beverage by this process should treat it in all respects as a fermented liquor, taking up on their records the material from which it is made.

Brewers who also manufacture a beverage which does not at any process of manufacture contain more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol should credit themselves, by separate red-ink entries on their material book with the quantity of materials used for this specific purpose, and should use the utmost care to keep the processes as well as the materials used in the production of the two classes of beverages separate, and to keep the taxable and untaxable articles separate and distinct one from the other. The temperance beverage, when removed from the brewery premises, must be contained in packages unlike those ordinarily used for containing fermented liquor.

Respectfully,

JOHN G. CAPERS,
Commissioner.

(T. D. 2354, volume 18.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1913.

To collectors of internal revenue and others concerned:

The following excerpt from an official letter emanating from this office on this date is published for the information of all concerned:

"Referring to your letter of May 15 last and to office reply thereto under date of May 24 in regard to a nonalcoholic beverage * * * you are informed that upon reconsideration of this matter I have decided to extend the scope of T. D. 1360 so as to make the question of the taxability of the so-called temperance beer produced on brewery premises concurrently with fermented liquors depend upon the alcoholic content at the time when the same is finished and ready for sale, without regard to the quantity of alcohol which it may have contained at previous stages of its manufacture. In other words, if the so-called temperance beer, when finished and ready for sale, does not contain more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, it will be regarded as a nontaxable article, even though it may have contained a greater percentage of alcohol during the process of its manufacture.

This ruling will take effect August 15, 1913, and in no case will it be retroactive. It will apply exclusively to beverages sold or removed on and after the 15th instant.

W. H. OSBORN,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. DYER. If I have any time I will be glad to yield to my colleague on the committee. Is my time up, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 12 seconds remaining.

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I suggest to the gentleman that in the Treasury decisions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. May the gentleman's time be extended for 30 seconds.

Mr. DYER. I asked for time from the chairman of the committee, but he refused to give it to me, and I had to obtain it from the gentleman on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the pending bill is to enforce war-time and constitutional prohibition. I shall confine my remarks to the constitutional aspects of that question, with particular reference to the bearing of the second section of the eighteenth amendment upon the present bill. The first section of the eighteenth amendment provides that—> the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors • • • for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

So far as the general effect of this language is concerned, of course it immediately is self-executing and wipes out all legislation in conflict with its provisions. The second section of the eighteenth amendment, however, provides as follows:

> The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that this language is vastly different from any enforcement provision heretofore contained in any constitutional amendment. In the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution the provisions were that—

> Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The words "concurrent power" of the several States were not included in any previous constitutional enforcement provision.

It is very significant that it was thought necessary to insert this change in this article of the Constitution. When the resolution suggesting the amendment passed the Senate and came over to the House for its action, it contained the usual provision that Congress alone should have the power to enforce the article by appropriate legislation. As it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I happened to be a member at the time, this change was inserted in it, and the change was inserted in it for a purpose. That purpose, it seems to me, is apparent upon the face of the article itself by the ordinary construction of the language which has been used. It is not a new feature in our Constitution that there should be joint action by the Federal and the State Governments. In the very first article of the Constitution, in the tenth section, there is provision made for prohibition upon the powers of the States with reference to certain legislation, and also provision made which is of the nature of conditional prohibition which requires concurrent action on the part of both Federal and State Governments. In Article I, section 10, for instance, the second paragraph provides:

> No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports—

And so forth.

The prohibition is conditional—that is, if Congress gives its consent. If there is joint action by the State and by Congress, then the State will have the power under this section to legislate on the question. Then again, the third paragraph of section 10 of Article I provides:

> No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage—

And so forth.

There again joint action is contemplated by the Federal Constitution, that the States can act provided the Federal Government gives its consent for such action. Again the word "concurrent" is used in the Constitution itself in the very first article with reference to legislation, where it provides that all acts or resolutions of Congress requiring the concurrence of the two Houses shall be presented to the President for his signature and approval, the concurrence of the two Houses meaning, of course, in the sense of joint action. These provisions are contained in the Constitution itself, and therefore it was no new thing to insert in this proposed article which was to be submitted to the States a provision that there should be joint action on the part of both the Federal and the State Governments. There was, however, a supreme reason which induced the insertion in this particular article of the language to which I have referred. It was regarded as an elementary principle that all jurisdiction upon the question of the control or the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors previous to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, outside of any war powers which might be exercised by the Congress, was vested in the several States, and that Congress, outside of any powers which it might have under the interstate-commerce clause, had no jurisdiction whatever of the question. Upon that question you will recall the specific provisions of one of the amendments to the Constitution that all powers not delegated to the Federal Government are reserved to the States.

Therefore it becomes, it seems to me, a very vital question to inquire what the real intention was in this change in the enforcement provision of this amendment to the Constitution. The enforcement of prohibitory legislation is something which reaches out into every State and into every school district and hamlet of the country. It meant that there would be legislation which would revolutionize in many sections of the country the social habits of the people and it meant that if this power were to be exercised to its fullest extent by the appointment of an unlimited number of Federal inspectors or agents it would be of such potential consequence in the exercise of it that it could be made a tremendous political engine throughout the length and breadth of the country which would reach into every school district of the country and obtain practical control of every doubtful congressional district in the country. It was in order that that situation might not arise, in order that the States should have some power left in control of the situation that this clause was inserted in this amendment, that the enforcement of it should be by the concurrent action of both the Federal and the State governments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that mean that if the State does not enact legislation by means of which it could undertake the enforcement of this provision the Federal jurisdiction for the enforcement would be complete, or does it mean that each must act before the jurisdiction is complete?

Mr. STEELE. My interpretation of this clause of the Constitution is that the word "concurrent" must be given its ordinary, usual, and accepted definition, that it means running together, joint, concurrent action, and that this action, in order to be complete under this provision of the Constitution, must be action not only of the Federal Government but of the State governments as well.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose a State refuses to take action?

Mr. STEELE. If the State refuses to take action there is no action; but you can not presume that the State is going to fail in the fulfillment of its duties; but there must be agreement.

Mr. MADDEN. The question I wanted to ask and perhaps did not ask is whether if the people of a given State through their State authority did not choose to adopt the law for the enforcement of the provisions of the act we are about to pass, would it then be within the power of the Federal Government to exercise control within that State?

Mr. STEELE. My answer to that is this: There can not be two supreme legislative powers exercising at the same time upon the same object.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. In this case in ratifying this amendment, in placing it as part of the Constitution, we have seen fit to create two joint supreme powers, one the Federal Government and the other the State government. Both of those supreme powers must act before full effect can be given to the concurrent provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. VENABLE. Under the Federal statute is provided a penalty for the robbing of box cars and goods in interstate transportation and power is conferred upon the State courts to enforce that statute and inflict a penalty and confine the offender after conviction in a State penal institution. How would the gentleman square that statute with the contention that you can not have two sovereignties acting upon an individual at the same time?

Mr. STEELE. The answer to that is simply this: You have in your State State laws operating upon certain objects. There can be both Federal and State legislation relating, for instance, to post offices or to the coinage, which may also be a penal offense under State laws.

Mr. VENABLE. That is not the case here, if the gentleman will pardon me. This is a case where the State courts and the State authorities are enforcing an act of Congress and a Federal statute. This is not a case where one act constitutes a breach of two laws. One law of the State and the other the law of the Federal Government. But this is a case where the State authority seizes the individual, takes him into the State court, tries him in a State tribunal, and sends him to a penal institution in the enforcement of a purely Federal statute.

Mr. STEELE. In that case the State court is simply the agent, you may say, of the Federal Government in the enforcement of a Federal law.

Mr. VENABLE. But I understood the gentleman's argument was that two sovereignties could not act upon an individual?

Mr. STEELE. The State did not enact the law in that case, it was simply enforcing the law. Only one sovereignty, the Federal Government, actually legislated.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. My time is limited, but I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is aware of the concurrent jurisdiction existing in the United States court and in our State circuit courts with respect to granting citizenship papers to individuals. If the State court has acquired jurisdiction of naturalization cases it grants the citizenship papers. If the United States court has acquired jurisdiction they naturalize them. Does not that answer the gentleman's contention?

Mr. STEELE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. It is concurrent?

Mr. STEELE. It does not answer my contention at all. The gentleman has failed to perceive that both Federal and State courts in naturalization cases are simply enforcing a Federal law. The law of one sovereignty that has the right to legislate upon the question and the only sovereignty that can legislate upon naturalization is the Federal Government.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman has referred to the concurrent action. Now, this amendment provides that Congress and the States shall have concurrent power to enforce. Do I understand the gentleman to contend the phrase "concurrent power" to enforce amounts to the same thing as "concurrent action"? Does not this concurrent power simply mean power is concurrent or running together? It does not necessitate at all that the action must be concurrent. Is it not then a very plain distinction between concurrent action and concurrent power to enforce?

Mr. STEELE. I will answer the gentleman, and then I must ask to be allowed to proceed without interruption, because my time is limited. I say to the gentleman that the language of this clause of the constitutional amendment calls for concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. The concurrent power to do what? To legislate. What is legislation? A rule of action by the supreme power, and that is what is contemplated here when the supreme power is the two sovereignties mentioned in this article. Now, I must be allowed to proceed, because my time is limited. Now, in this particular construction, and it is not a technical construction, because I am giving the ordinary and usual meaning to the word "concurrent." "Concurrent" is defined in the Century Dictionary as meaning "concurring or acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event or effect; operating with; coincident; conjoined; joint; concomitant; coordinate; combined." In the Standard Dictionary it is defined as "meeting or joining at the same point; united in action or application; coordinate." Webster says it means the "act of concurring; meeting or coming together; union; conjunction."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I want to be perfectly candid and state just what I believe those who are particularly espousing prohibition——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEELE. I will, if the gentleman will grant me additional time out of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not got the time; but I would like to call attention to what the lawyers say the word "concurrent" means, not the dictionaries——

Mr. STEELE. I can not yield. The gentleman can put that in his own time, of course. But I simply wish to state what the contention is on the other side in reference to this, and then, in the time which I have at hand, try to point out what I regard as the fallacy of that course of reasoning. In the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Wheeler, who represented the Anti-Saloon League, presented an argument as to the proper interpretation of this second clause of the constitutional amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] asked him these questions:

Mr. HUSTED. Before you read that, in order to clarify the matter in my mind, at least, will you kindly state just what you understand the word "concurrent" to mean as used in the amendment? Do you understand it to be synonymous with "coexistent"?

Mr. WHEELER. I understand concurrent power to be "equal power" to carry out the purpose of the eighteenth amendment by the enactment of appropriate legislation, and if either unit of the Government fails to use its full power it will not prevent the other unit of Government from doing that which the first unit of Government had the power to do but failed to do.

Mr. HUSTED. Is there any authority for such a definition?

Mr. WHEELER. Concurrent power means equal power. The difficulty that had arisen from this provision comes from the use of the term in connection with concurrent jurisdiction and legislation.

And amplifying what he meant by equal power, Mr. Wheeler further said:

Each of these units of Government, the Federal and the State, will enact the laws for its own jurisdiction. They will be enforced by the officers of their own jurisdiction. To make the case concrete, suppose that Ohio should pass a law different from the Federal Code and Congress should pass a more stringent law than Ohio. So far as the Federal officers were concerned, they would enforce the Federal act all through Ohio; the State officers in Ohio would also enforce the State legislation that is enacted there. There would be a slight embarrassment for lawbreakers in this, that there would be two standards or laws; but that is true with legislation that we now have.

Now, that is the contention of those who are arguing for extreme action on the part of Congress. The contention is that it shall be equal and that in its final analysis the word "concurrent" must mean paramount, supreme, instead of what it ordinarily means, namely, concurrent—joint or cooperative. There can not be two equal supreme legislative powers acting upon the same object.

Now, it simply would mean this, that so far as the State power is concerned the Federal governmental agencies would come into each one of the several States, and no matter what the action of the State might be with reference to enforcement provisions, they would enforce the Federal law. For instance, Rhode Island has already passed an act providing for the manufacture and sale of liquors containing not more than 4 per cent of alcohol. Suppose that Congress here should pass this law which makes it a penal offense for anybody to manufacture or sell liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. Manifestly there would be, then, if that interpretation were to prevail, a contradiction between the Federal legislation and the State legislation. And if the equal-power theory were to prevail, then it would simply result in Federal agents, as stated by Mr. Wheeler, going into the State of Rhode Island and arresting everybody who might act upon the provisions of the Rhode Island State law. It would mean that they would be penalized under the Federal law for doing the very things which the State law had authorized them to do.

Now, is that a situation that is to be tolerated? Is it reasonable that Congress, in suggesting this constitutional amendment, is it reasonable to suppose that the people in ratifying it, meant by "concurrent power" that that condition of affairs should exist in every State of this Union? I do not believe it; neither do I think it is a reasonable or fair or proper interpretation, or an interpretation which the language used fairly bears and imports.

If that were to be done, it would simply mean that the Federal power would be supreme. What would be the necessity for any State action at all if in the difference between the State government and the Federal Government, the Federal Government should be supreme? What has become of the concurrent power that is mentioned in this article of the Constitution? It would be the same as if that provision had not been inserted.

Mr. DEWALT. May I interrupt the gentleman just a moment?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEWALT. Does not another article of the Constitution provide for concurrent action in regard to treaties?

Mr. STEELE. It does.

Mr. DEWALT. What is the meaning of the word "concurrent" there? And, reasoning from that standpoint, what is the reasoning in regard to this? I think that is the seventh article of the Constitution.

Mr. STEELE. Simply, as I recall the provision of the article, it authorizes the President to negotiate treaties, and, when ratified by two-thirds of the Senate, to become the supreme law of the land. There, again, joint action is required—the action of the Executive and action on the part of the Senate. It simply bears out what I said previously, that joint action is contemplated by a number of the provisions of the Constitution.

And while on that subject I may call the attention of the committee to another provision of the Constitution which contemplates joint action. In the provision with reference to——

Mr. DEWALT. "Joint resolutions" is another one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. IGOE. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. In the provision with reference to the election of Senators and Representatives it provides that they shall be elected in accordance with the election laws of the States, but it also says that Congress may make and alter other laws with reference to the same subject, also contemplating joint action by the States and by Congress.

Now, I have just referred to the sixth article of the Constitution, which provides that all laws made in pursuance of this Constitution and all treaties made shall be the supreme law of the land, which has been referred to by numerous people with reference to the proper interpretation of this article. That says, "In pursuance of this Constitution"; and if it is not concurrent, it is not in pursuance of the Constitution. Again, a clause in a constitutional amendment, being the latest expressed will of the people, will prevail over a provision of the original instrument inconsistent with the amendment; and in this connection I wish to call your attention to several judicial interpretations of the word "concurrent" as used in legislation heretofore.

In my own State of Pennsylvania, where the Delaware River is the boundary line between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, immediately after the American Revolution a compact was entered into between the State of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey providing that both States should have concurrent jurisdiction over the waters of the Delaware River. The question came before the courts of New Jersey in two cases—one the Trenton City Bridge Co., in Thirteenth New Jersey, Equity Reports 46, and the other in the case of Attorney General against Railroad Co., Twenty-seventh New Jersey, Equity 627.

In both cases this court, one of the recognized courts of the country—recognized for ability—in passing upon the word "concurrent" with reference to the jurisdiction over the river held that required joint action, and that unless joint action was taken by the legislatures of both States it was invalid. In one case in particular an act was passed by the State of New Jersey and the State of Pennsylvania refused to concur in it, and the court of New Jersey finally held that the statute passed by New Jersey was a nullity.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STEELE. If I have time. My time is very limited, and I want to finish if I can.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I just wanted to ask what would be the gentleman's idea as to the practical working of this legislation under section 2 of the eighteenth amendment. Is it the gentleman's contention that in order to get effective action under that section Congress would have to pass an act and that act would have to be validated by all the States of the Union?

Mr. STEELE. It would not have to be validated by all the States of the Union, but in order to be effective in any State it would have to be concurred in by that particular State. It may be concurred in by 20 States or 25 States, and it may be refused to be concurred in by one other State, and in that particular State it would not apply.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then, under your theory, the action of Congress would not be operative?

Mr. STEELE. I say it means here joint action. It is a question of language, and I am giving you the meaning of the words and the interpretation of the courts.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Take, for instance, the State of Virginia, and suppose Congress passed an act to enforce section 2, and Virginia does not pass such an act putting it into effect. Then it would not be valid in Virginia?

Mr. STEELE. That is correct.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then Virginia, in order to make it effective in Virginia, would have to validate the act of Congress?

Mr. STEELE. It would have to concur. The same principle was enunciated in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Oregon with reference to a compact entered into between the States of Oregon and Washington in reference to the Columbia River. There concurrent jurisdiction was also given, and in an early case, in Sixty-ninth Federal, page 535, which was cited with approval in Nelson v. Oregon (212 U. S., 315), the court held that inasmuch as the act of Congress admitting Oregon into the Union provided for concurrent jurisdiction on the Columbia River the word "concurrent" when applied to the jurisdiction of Oregon to enact penal laws for the Columbia River "can only mean the power to enact such criminal statutes as are agreed to or acquiesced in by the State of Washington or as are already in force within its jurisdiction."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I regret I have not the time. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] will give me additional time, I will try to answer.

The court concluded its opinion in that case as follows:

It is clear, therefore, that this right in each State is not subject to control or regulation by the other unless there is mutual agreement to that end.

In Wedding v. Meyler (192 U. S., 573), under what is known as the Virginia compact and the act of Congress making Kentucky a State, the State of Indiana had concurrent jurisdiction with Kentucky on the Ohio River. The court said:

But so far as applicable we adopt the statement of Chief Justice Robertson in Arnold v. Shields (5 Dana, 18): "Jurisdiction unqualified, being as it is the sovereign authority to make, decide on, and execute laws, a concurrence of jurisdiction, therefore, must entitle Indiana to as much power, legislative, judicial, and executive, as that possessed by Kentucky over as much of the Ohio River as flows between them."

In Nelson v. Oregon (212 U. S., 315) a question again arose as to concurrent jurisdiction of the States of Oregon and Washington over the Columbia River, and it was held that one holding a purse-net license from the State of Washington could not be prosecuted for using such net on the Washington side of the Columbia River in the courts of Oregon for violating the statute of that State prohibiting the use of such nets.

The court said:

The plaintiff in error was within the limits of the State of Washington doing an act which that State in terms authorized and gave him a license to do. Can the State of Oregon, by virtue of its concurrent jurisdiction, disregard that authority, practically override the legislation of Washington, and punish a man for doing within the territorial limits of Washington an act which that State had especially authorized him to do? We are of opinion that it can not. It is not at all impossible that in some instances the interests of the two States may be different. Certainly, as appears in the present case, the opinion of the legislatures of the two States is different, and the one can not enforce its opinion against that of the other.

The fundamental purpose in construing a constitutional provision is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the framers and the people who adopted it. It should not be technical, literal, or strict, but should aim to give effect to the purpose indicated by a fair interpretation of the language used. This purpose, however, must be gathered from the language of the instrument itself. The first resort in all cases is to the ordinary meaning of the words actually used. Application of this rule inevitably leads to the conclusion that joint action by Congress and the several States is necessary for enforcement legislation under the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall be barely able to cover this subject during the time allotted to me, and I must therefore request that I be not interrupted until I shall have concluded my statement. Then if I have the time I will very gladly yield for any questions that anyone may desire to ask.

This is one of the most important measures before Congress. It purports to answer the demand of a great Nation that has outlawed the traffic in intoxicating liquors. On December 18, 1917, the Sixty-fifth Congress submitted to the legislatures of the various States what has since become the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution. Within 13 months three-fourths of the States had ratified. Forty-five out of the 48 have now ratified.

The eighteenth amendment reads:

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States, and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Congress is charged with the task of enacting a code to enforce that amendment. The happiness and welfare of countless thousands throughout the land depend upon how ably Congress meets that duty and responsibility. We may differ as to the extent of our authority to legislate under the eighteenth amendment, we may differ as to the wisdom of some features in this bill, but its purpose should command the support of every Member. It was a wise judge, speaking for the court in Goddard v. Jacksonville (15 Ill., 589), who said:

When we defend the sale of liquors * * * we draw our arguments from our appetites and not our reason, observation, and experience.

Whether or not we favored prohibition is no longer the question. It matters not what our personal views or prejudices may be. Our plain and paramount duty is to uphold the Constitution. We should enact a sane and sensible code. It will be neither sane nor sensible if it fails to take into consideration the nature of the business that has been outlawed and the characteristics and tendencies of those who will endeavor to thwart the Nation's will.

Justice McReynolds, in rendering the opinion in Crane v. Campbell (245 U. S., 304), referred to "the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors."

The Supreme Court (137 U. S., 86) has characterized the liquor traffic as "a source of crime and misery to society." Courts take judicial notice of the general lawlessness of this business. Congress should also take notice that the liquor interests use every subterfuge to break down prohibition law and then boast of its failure. We must legislate with these matters fully in mind. [Applause.]

Constitutional prohibition will not become effective until January 16, 1920. The so-called war-time prohibition has, since September 8, 1917, prohibited the manufacture of distilled liquors, and since May 1, 1919, the manufacture of beer and wine. Under its provisions the sale of any intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes has been unlawful since June 30. The President has requested Congress to repeal this law. If it is not repealed or its terms suspended by the President, then Congress should provide for its enforcement by additional legislation.

Title 1 of the bill under consideration is submitted for that purpose.

In my judgment, Congress will never repeal war-time prohibition. It was a wise enactment. It is just as sensible and right to-day as it was on the 21st day of last November, when the President signed the bill. [Applause.] If Congress is to be criticized, it should be for waiting so long before acting in the first place. This delay was not occasioned by the House. In less than 60 days after we entered the war it passed a bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors. Upon the suggestion of the President, this bill was amended in the Senate so as to prohibit only the manufacture of distilled spirits. The President was authorized, in his discretion, to prohibit the manufacture of beer and other intoxicants. This act was approved on August 10, 1917, and contained the following language:

That from and after 30 days from date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes * * * whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or the reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor is essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized from time to time to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated.

Congress by that act outlawed the manufacture of whisky and distilled liquors, but President Wilson failed to use his authority and prohibit the manufacture of beer. His reluctance and failure to act then, when the Nation was at war, should not inspire any particular confidence in his recommendations now. In answer to righteous public sentiment, Congress took this matter in hand, and the Agricultural bill which became a law on November 21, 1918, contained this provision:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization * * * it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and * * * no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

In his message to Congress on May 20, 1919, the President said:

The demobilization of the military forces of the country has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and beer, but I am advised that without further legislation I have not the legal authority to remove the restriction.

This advice was given at a time when we had in our Army 1,500,000 men. Our regular standing Army in peace times is 175,000. The President says it seems to him entirely safe to remove the ban because demobilization has progressed to such a point. Is there any reason for prohibition during demobilization? Congress so declared, and even the President does not deny. If we owed it to any of our soldier boys and their loved ones back home from whom we called them to remove the liquor curse during their demobilization, then we owe it to the million yet to be demobilized to extend them the same protection.

This so-called war-time prohibition was never intended to cover only the period of the war. The exact language of the act is:

Until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization.

Our language was plain. We did not deceive the brewers, saloon keepers, or anyone else. Demobilization has not terminated, and until then the President has no moral or legal right to throw down the bars to the liquor interests of the country. [Applause.]

For many days the Committee on the Judiciary has held hearings upon measures relating to the liquor traffic. No brewers or distillers appeared before the committee. Are they no longer interested? Where are the powerful brewers who lobbied with us a few months ago? I will tell you. It has become common knowledge that brewers were the sustaining force behind the ill-famed German-American Alliance. Brewers met with agents of the Kaiser and for mutual protection planned to purchase great American newspapers. They were ready to assist the Kaiser in spreading his lying propaganda if in the same columns their own unholy cause might be pleaded. They stand discredited before the country, and that is the reason why they are not here protesting against this legislation. [Applause.]

Organized labor furnished nearly all the witnesses who urged the repeal of war-time prohibition. They also demanded that we make constitutional prohibition a farce by declaring 2¾ per cent beer nonintoxicating. Much of this testimony before the committee seemed manufactured for the purpose. Colorado, for instance, has had prohibition for over three years, yet its labor representatives appeared to tell us that they object to our taking away the booze that their own State deprived them of several years before. Indiana is dry, yet its labor leaders entered a similar protest. I am proud to say that no Michigan labor representative appeared to protest, and in view of Michigan's overwhelming vote in April, 1919, against even beer and wine, I assumed that no one would have the audacity to say that Michigan's workingmen are opposed to prohibition.

Now, Mr. Gompers has spoken. He filed with the Senate Judiciary Committee and published throughout the country a base and slanderous charge against the citizens of Michigan. Gompers states that while the reds made a desperate but unsuccessful effort to gain foothold in Detroit prior to May 1, 1918, when prohibition became effective, that now, because of prohibition, Detroit has become a hotbed of anarchy and Bolshevism. His ridiculous statement insults our intelligence. Reds and radicals stand for crime. Their favorite rendezvous is the saloon. On April 15, 1918, I took occasion to call to the attention of this House that reds and disloyalists were actively interfering with Detroit's great war industries. The saloons were then running full blast. The record of arrests at Detroit during this wet era compared with Detroit's record as the largest prohibition city in the world conclusively answers Mr. Gompers's statement. [Applause.]

Statistics indicate that arrests for crimes and misdemeanors for the dry year ending May 1, 1919, over the preceding wet year decreased as follows:

Murder, 71 per cent; felonious assault, 58 per cent; carrying concealed weapons, 66 per cent; robbery, 67 per cent; disturbing peace, 52 per cent; disorderly charges, 93 per cent; vagrancy, 86 per cent; begging, 92 per cent; and a total of 26,140 less misdemeanors.

[Applause.]

Mayor James Cousens, replying to Gompers's charges, telegraphed me:

No evidence on either May 1 or July 4 celebrations that Detroit is overrun with Bolshevists. We have had no disturbances and no evidence that what Mr. Gompers says is correct and can find no evidence of discontent as a result of prohibition.

[Applause.]

When I hear these wet leaders tell how labor is opposed to prohibition, I often wonder why they refer to labor in such a restricted sense. Why do they exclude millions of laborers who refrain from joining the union because they fear some walking boss or labor agitator may force them into a sympathetic strike and idleness, even though their employer and employment be satisfactory in every way? Why do they ignore thousands of patriotic, intelligent union men who vigorously oppose liquor traffic? Why do they exclude the farmer in the fields, who works from early morn until late each day? He works longer hours and toils more than any other people. Upon his efforts we depend for the food necessary to life itself. To his credit and everlasting glory it can truthfully be said that the farmer stands for highest ideals and has made possible the success of the prohibition cause.

I am unwilling to believe that Mr. Gompers and the witnesses before our committee expressed labor's views upon prohibition. Nor was the wet parade, staged upon the Capitol steps to frighten and intimidate Congress, typical of American workingmen. The foreign element who have not yet assimilated American habits were much in evidence. [Applause.] The labor leaders told us that these people coming here from eastern Europe considered that we were taking away their rights and that prohibition would cause great unrest. Some hinted that it might drive certain elements of labor to the Bolshevists. Will prohibition cause unrest and violence among otherwise law-abiding people? The contention is absurd. When we have labor unrest and violent strikes, we close the saloons. We took liquor away from the Indians because of their natural unrest and the tendency of liquor to incite irrational and violent conduct. If these alarmists could scare and stampede Congress into meeting their demands now, what would they do next January when the Constitution of their country forbids the traffic in intoxicating liquors? Will it cause any less unrest in January than it causes in July? Congress must decide now whether its policy shall be to heed those who threaten, or shall it write upon the statute books in clear and certain language that no interference with the Constitution of the United States and the manifested will of its people is going to be tolerated? [Applause.]

The Committee on the Judiciary concluded after much deliberation that the enforcement code for war-time prohibition should be placed under a different title, and thereby separated from the code for constitutional prohibition. Many believed that the constitutional amendment would permit of more drastic provisions for its enforcement than would the language used in the war-time prohibition act. Congress has no inherent power to legislate upon the subject of liquor traffic. Its action must be predicated either upon the Constitution or its war powers. The eighteenth amendment does not prohibit until January, 1920. War-time prohibition enacted under the war powers of Congress prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, but expressly provides for their exportation. The Constitution prohibits the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and exportation of intoxicating liquors.

The submission and ratification of constitutional prohibition in the United States represents the culmination of the greatest moral movement recorded in centuries. How we can best enforce this amendment is worthy of our highest consideration and our best effort. The committee submits title 2 of the present bill for that purpose.

Certain legal propositions are naturally, if not necessarily, encountered. Section 2 of the eighteenth amendment provides that "Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." What is meant by concurrent power? Must the legislatures of the States and the Congress of the United States act in conjunction and only to an equal extent? Or does the word "concurrent" as it appears in this section denote coextensive and equal power? The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], who has just preceded me, insists that the legislatures of the States and the Congress of the United States must act together in enacting enforcement legislation, but I submit that the words "concurrent power" require nothing of the kind. One of the primary rules for the construction of statutes and constitutional amendments is that the court shall give to them the most reasonable construction. No one will contend that it would be reasonable to expect that the States and the Federal Government would or could act in conjunction and to an equal degree. To place such a construction upon this section would be to absolutely defeat its purpose. However, to construe the grant of concurrent power as conferring equal right and jurisdiction upon the State and Federal Governments to enforce by appropriate legislation the eighteenth amendment is not only reasonable and just but practicable in application. Notwithstanding the views expressed in the minority report—and I have the very highest regard for the gentlemen who have signed that report, for I know them well, and they are men of great capability—I have not the slightest doubt as to the opinion of the Supreme Court when this question has been presented.

Referring to the grant of "concurrent power," the gentlemen joining in the minority report inquire, "What was intended by the Congress and the people who ratified the amendment in using the qualifying phrase mentioned?" They would have us believe that neither the legislatures of the States nor the Congress of the United States can act by itself in the enactment of enforcement legislation. They tell us that State and Nation must act in conjunction, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] has just told us that even an act of Congress will not be effective in any State until the legislature of that State has consented thereto. They inquire as to what was intended by Congress and the people who ratified the amendment by using the words "concurrent power." I will tell these perplexed and distinguished gentlemen just what Congress meant and what the people had a right to understand it as meaning. Every gentleman who signed that minority report was in this very House on December 17, 1917, when this identical resolution was passed. They heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, tell Congress and the country why this section 2 had been added. At page 423, volume 56, part 1, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. WEBB said:

> The first amendment adopted in the Judiciary Committee was the new section 2. As it passed the Senate it provided that "Congress" should have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. Most of the members, including myself, of the Judiciary Committee, both wet and dry, felt that there ought to be a reservation to the State also of power to enforce their prohibition laws. And therefore we amended the resolution by providing that the Congress "and the several States" shall have "concurrent" power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. So the amendment reads:
> "The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."
> I believe, regardless of our division on the dry and wet question, every Member will agree with us that this is a wise and proper amendment. Nobody desires that the Federal Congress shall take away from the various States the right to enforce the prohibition laws of those States.

The Chairman of the Judiciary Committee thus plainly stated that the purpose of this amendment was to reserve to the States the power and privilege of prohibiting within their boundaries the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Did any gentleman who today questions this construction arise in his place and suggest that this amendment would not bear the construction given it by the gentleman from North Carolina? No; they wait until it has become the fundamental law of the land and then ingeniously argue that Congress and the people must have had in mind some strange notions that were probably not even conceived by those who now suggest them until within the past few days.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I wish the gentleman would refrain until I have concluded my statement.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman permit me to interrupt to ask him a question?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me until I have finished my statement. If I am given time, I shall be glad to answer the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois, for I think I can.

Can it be conceived that over 30 prohibition States have enthusiastically joined in a movement to divest themselves of the right to prohibit liquor traffic within their own borders and have willingly substituted a farcical proposition requiring the consent of Congress before they can enact any prohibitory law? That is just what these gentlemen would have you believe, for they say in their report:

> Just as in the tenth section of article 1 the States are prohibited from legislating without the consent of Congress, so here joint or concurrent legislation is necessary for the enactment of proper enforcement legislation.

It is the identical argument of the gentleman who has preceded me. And what about the enforcement of prohibition in the wet State? If their construction is sound, Congress will have no right to make its enactment operative until the legislature of that wet State concurs in the action of Congress.

But we are confronted with a further query as to the effect of this reservation to the States of concurrent power to enforce the eighteenth amendment. If Congress adopts the definition of intoxicating liquors as provided in this measure and prohibits intoxicants containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, and New York, for instance, in legislating upon this same subject should define intoxicating liquors as those containing more than 2¾ per cent of alcohol by volume, which law will govern? Will the ordinary rule that the Federal Constitution and laws take precedence over State enactments control in this case or is this rule defeated by the very terms of section 2, which reserves to the State equal and concurrent power with that to be exercised by the Congress? It will be ably contended here that, notwithstanding the concurrent power reserved by the States, an act of Congress will take precedence and supersede any State law which may be in conflict therewith. This contention is based upon subdivision 2, article 6, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads:

> This Constitution and laws of the United States * * * shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman if he can yield me 15 additional minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. How much time was the gentleman recognized for in the first instance?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan was recognized for 30 minutes and is now recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. In my judgment it is unnecessary for us to decide this question for the reason that no conflict can arise between the Federal and State acts. This constitutional amendment is the fundamental law of the land. Congress and the State legislatures have full power to enforce its provisions. Either body may exercise that authority to its full limit or fall short thereof to any degree that its legislative wisdom directs.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I should prefer if the gentleman will just permit me to finish this——

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it is connected with that point. I merely wanted the gentleman's judgment as to whether the power of Congress is supreme to define what is and what is not intoxicating.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I will answer the gentleman later.

It is preposterous to assert that the States have divested themselves of their inherent police power over the subject of liquor traffic. Even the minority dare not assert this proposition. In order to warrant their conclusion that Congress can not broaden the construction of the eighteenth amendment, they find it necessary to claim that the Federal Government has been granted no general police power. They admit then that general police power was retained by the State. It is not necessary, therefore, that a State, legislating to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors, predicate its action upon this constitutional amendment. It need not say that it has legislated to enforce the eighteenth amendment. Its general police power gives it plenary authority to deal with this subject.

Congress in 1884 prohibited the transportation between States of live stock which had or might have infectious or contagious diseases.

Reid v. Colorado (189 U. S., 137) sustains the constitutionality of this act of Congress and also the constitutionality of a Colorado statute supplementing the Federal act and providing far more stringent provisions. In this particular case the shipper had complied with provisions of the Federal act. Justice Harlan said:

> Now it is said that defendant has a right under the Constitution of the United States to ship live stock from one State into another. This will be conceded on all hands, but the defendant is not given by that instrument the right to introduce into a State, against its will, live stock affected by a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and whose presence in the State will or may be injurious to its domestic animals.

Congress had acted upon this subject matter by virtue of its power to regulate commerce. Colorado likewise had legislated upon this subject matter under its police powers; yet notwithstanding the more stringent provisions of the State law the constitutionality of both acts was sustained. They were not in conflict even though one legislative body had gone much further than had the other.

Mr. SEIGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I have not the time; I am very sorry.

Assuming that a legislative body has the right to define intoxicating liquors as those containing in excess of one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, then Congress may exercise its power and so define "intoxicating liquors." New York may not choose to exercise its full authority and be content to prohibit only those liquors which contain in excess of 2¾ per cent of alcohol. These statutes are not necessarily in conflict. One who traffics in liquor in New York may not violate his State law, yet he may violate the Federal law. He may violate both laws by the same act.

> Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of some other State or Territory, and he may be liable to punishment for infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both; that either or both may, if they see fit, punish such offender can not be doubted. Yet it can not be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offense. (14 How., 13; see also 100 U. S. Rep., 371.)

In McKinley v. Loudon (209 Fed., 307) the court said:

> It is no defense to a prosecution for a violation of the antitrust laws of a State that the accused by the same general course of conduct has also violated the similar laws of the United States or, indeed, has been punished therefor.

Now I come to the proposition propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. The gentleman asks whether or not Congress has any right, under that constitutional provision, to define the meaning of the words "intoxicating liquors."

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not say "any right"; I said "complete power."

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Congress has the right just as fully as the State, and I would say it has complete power.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman contend that the court would not have the right to determine the question of fact?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I contend, and I will try to convince the gentleman as I proceed with my argument, that Congress has complete power to define the meaning of the words "intoxicating liquors," and when Congress exercises that power of definition it is no longer a question of fact for the courts.

It is contended by the minority report that Congress has no authority to define intoxicating liquors; that in the enforcement code our power is limited to a repetition of the language used in the Constitution. If Congress has not the power to define "intoxicating liquors," then it must be left as a question of fact for every court and jury in the land. There can be no uniformity nor certainty. The temptation to traffic in liquors on the border line of doubt would be tantamount to an invitation. That the uncertainty as to what is intoxicating will be used by the liquor interests as an excuse for lawlessness requires no argument since July 1. There can be no proper enforcement of prohibition unless Congress defines the term "intoxicating liquors." The necessity of definition brings the act of defining clearly within the meaning of "appropriate legislation."

The right to define the power conferred upon it by the Constitution has been exercised by Congress time after time, and its exercise sustained by the Supreme Court. The courts will recognize that Congress is legislating with reference to the most lawless and scheming traffic with which the Government deals.

In the Legal Tender cases (110 U. S., 241) the Supreme Court said that the Constitution was "intended to endure for ages, and to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs, and not to be interpreted with the strictness of a private contract."

Chief Justice White, in rendering the opinion sustaining the Webb-Kenyon law, said (242 U. S., 332):

> The fact that regulations of liquor have been upheld in numberless instances which would have been repugnant to the great guaranties of the Constitution but for the enlarged right possessed by Government to regulate liquor has never, that we are aware of, been taken as affording the basis for the thought that Government might exert an enlarged power as to the subjects to which, under the constitutional guaranties, such enlarged power could not be applied. In other words, the exceptional nature of the subject here regulated is the basis upon which the exceptional power exerted must rest, and affords no ground for any fear that such power may be constitutionally extended to things which it may not, consistently with the guaranties of the Constitution, embrace.

Justice McReynolds, in rendering the opinion in Crane against Campbell (245 U. S., 304), said:

> And considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary and unreasonable or without proper relation to the legitimate legislative purpose.

These opinions from the Supreme Court of the United States are submitted to answer the argument of the minority that Congress must confine itself to the exact language of the Constitution, and that its authority to legislate can not be broadened by any implied power.

I now call upon my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], for whose ability I have the greatest respect, to bear witness to the correctness of my views upon this proposition. On this very floor, December 17, 1917, the gentleman from Pennsylvania ably contended for this doctrine.

At page 445, volume 56, part 1, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. STEELE said:

> The Constitution used general terms, and whatever is prudent and proper and necessary to carry out those general and expressed powers are within the powers of Congress. The general power that has been conferred includes in it all that is necessary or proper to make it effective. Here is what Justice Story says upon this subject:
> "The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people in framing this great charter of our liberties to provide for minute specifications of its powers or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that it would be a perilous and difficult if not an impracticable task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure for a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter, and restrictions and specification which at the present might seem salutary might in the end prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving the legislature from time to time to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects and to mold and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and the public interests should require."

Now, says Mr. STEELE:

> When the Constitution further declared that Congress should have the power to pass all necessary and proper legislation for carrying into execution this power, of course it conferred upon Congress the discretion in the first instance of deciding what was necessary and proper. Hence this term "necessary and proper," as conferred in this general power, has been repeatedly passed upon by the Supreme Court, and I will only refer to what is regarded as the classic definition of this power as used by Chief Justice Marshall in McCullough against Maryland, where he said: "The determination of what are appropriate means"—

He declared—

"belongs to the government which is to employ them. The Government, which has a right to do an act and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means."

Aside from this proposition, it has been urged that Congress has no right in any event to define intoxicating liquors to include beverages that may not, in fact, be intoxicating. This measure asserts the authority of Congress to define intoxicating liquors. It asserts the authority of Congress to prohibit the traffic in liquors that may, in fact, be nonintoxicating to the average person. Both propositions are based upon sound reason and sustained in theory by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has been urged that the Federal Government has no police powers under which its jurisdiction over the subject matter may be broadened. This proposition is based upon the earlier decisions, and even these admitted of some exceptions. For instance, in Reeves v. Corning (U. S., 51 Fed., 774) the court said:

The police power originally and inherently belongs to the States, and it will remain with them unless impliedly taken away by a fair construction of the Constitution and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof.

Police power belongs to the several States and not to the Federal Government, save in exceptional cases. (State v. Schlenker, 84 N. W., 598; 51 L. R. A., 347.)

What is meant by "police power" is quite generally understood, but with difficulty defined. Justice Greer in the License cases (46 U. S., 504) said:

Without attempting to define what are the peculiar subjects or limits of this power it may safely be affirmed that every law for the restriction or punishment of crime for the preservation of the public peace, health, and morals must come within this category.

The court in State v. Fitzpatrick (11 Atl., 757) said:

The police power is exercised in legislation designed to protect public health and morals, to punish and prevent crime, to alleviate and prevent pauperism and especially to diminish and prevent the demoralization and impoverishment and the number of vices and miseries which are usually concomitant of a free traffic in intoxicating liquors.

While the courts have been reluctant to expressly say that the Federal Government has police powers, the tendency of the courts has been to concede to the Federal Government the exercise of police power with relation to those subject matters over which the Federal Government has the power to legislate. Congress has time and again asserted its right to exercise police powers. Its enactment of legislation upon the white-slave traffic, food regulations, quarantine and immigration restrictions, the Webb-Kenyon Act, and various other measures have all asserted the right of Congress to exercise police power. These acts have been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, not upon the express ground that the Federal Government possesses any police power, but because the eighth section, Article I, of the Constitution provides that the powers granted may be enforced by any legislation "necessary and proper," and because Congress has implied authority to enact any legislation having a reasonable relation to the object sought. This contention was sustained in the case of the United States v. Hoke (227 U. S., 309), and the court used these words:

Congress may adopt not only the necessary but the convenient means necessary to exercise its power over a subject completely within its power, and such means may have the quality of police regulations.

In the Rahrer case (140 U. S., 345) it was said in sustaining the Wilson Act that the act was—Enacted in the exercise of its police powers and is constitutional and valid.

In a very recent case, United States v. Doremus, decided on March 3, 1919, the Supreme Court sustained an act of Congress, which was in effect a police regulation relative to the sale of certain drugs. Its validity was sustained because Congress had the power to enact any legislation having a reasonable relation to the object authorized under express powers delegated to the Federal Government.

The State of Mississippi, in its effort to suppress traffic in intoxicating liquors, made it unlawful to manufacture "poinsetta," which contained no alcohol whatsoever. It was contended that the legislature was not within the exercise of its police power in enacting this law. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch (226 U. S., 192), sustained the constitutionality of that statute not because it came within the police power of the State, but because the legislature deemed that law necessary to make effective its own lawful act—prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The court said:

When a State exercising its recognized authority undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition, the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the Government.

It is reasonable to suppose, in view of these adjudications, that Congress has the power in prohibiting the liquor traffic to go beyond the exact language of the Constitution and to do those things that have a reasonable relation to the legitimate object sought or, exactly what the Supreme Court upheld in United States against Hoke, supra, adopting means necessary or convenient having the quality of police regulations in order to accomplish a lawful result.

In United States v. 43 Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188) the Supreme Court said:

Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the "Indian country," but may extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I thank you.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I will not have the time. I trust the gentleman will pardon me.

It is comforting, in the consideration of this measure, for us to be able to remove this question beyond the possibility of a doubt. The Supreme Court has upon many occasions upheld the exercise of a similar power as inferred or implied from the express grant. In this case the express power is conferred upon Congress to enact appropriate legislation to enforce national prohibition. It is unnecessary for Congress to enter upon any field of doubt as to its implied authority. The States have delegated to Congress equal power and jurisdiction to deal with this subject matter. Congress has every right possessed by the States to enact appropriate legislation to make effective the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. For its guidance it is proper and in the interest of public policy for Congress to observe the legislation that the several prohibition States have found necessary or convenient to curb the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

The statutes of over 30 States define intoxicating liquors in substantially the language used in this bill. The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the States in defining intoxicating liquors to include even those that are nonintoxicating, not by reason of any police power exercised by the States, but because the Supreme Court has recognized that the nature of the business with which we are dealing makes it necessary sometimes to prohibit even innocent acts in order to make effective the legitimate object sought.

The Supreme Court (83 Ohio, 58), in deciding whether or not beer containing four-tenths of 1 per cent alcohol was intoxicating, said:

The legislature may have heard of Bishop's beer, Friedon beer, and later of near beer, and concluded that the enforcement of the will of the majority should not be defeated by subterfuge or the juggling in percentages of alcohol, and has said that for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the people to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, certain beverages shall be legally considered intoxicating, although not so in fact; and malt liquor is one of those so designated. "Near beer" being a malt liquor the statute pronounces it an intoxicating liquor and made proof of its real intoxicating qualities unnecessary.

In Feibelman v. State (130 Ala., 112) the court, passing upon a statute prohibiting a nonintoxicating malt liquor called "hopjack," said in sustaining its constitutionality:

But if prohibition should go only to the sale of intoxicating malt liquors, there would be left open such opportunities for evasions and there would arise such difficulties of proof as the law could not be effectively executed.

As to the definition of "intoxicating liquors," it is proper to consider that the Federal Government has for years imposed a tax upon all alcoholic liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol. The Federal Government has thus recognized this distinction between intoxicating and nonintoxicating liquors.

Subdivision B, section 14 of Treasury Decisions, 2788 (Commissioner of Internal Revenue), reads:

Within the intent of the act of November 21, 1918, a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume will be regarded as intoxicating.

In conclusion, let me express the opinion that Congress has ample authority in every way to make effective national prohibition. There is not a single obstacle in our way. The Nation has outlawed the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The weak as well as the strong are entitled to the benefits of this constitutional guaranty. The responsibility now rests with Congress. I am confident that Congress will go forward with this task to its full accomplishment. The lawless must not be permitted to nullify the Constitution because of any failure on our part to provide a suitable code for its enforcement. We must insist that the Constitution be sustained and the law enforced and, in the language of the immortal Lincoln—

> Let reverence for the laws be * * * proclaimed in legislative halls and enforced in courts of justice, and in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have never in my life attempted to discuss the question of prohibition, and being a new Member of this House, if I believed that the provisions of this law were calculated in good faith to carry out the provisions of the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution, I would not attempt to discuss it now. But the provisions of this bill extend far beyond the most drastic construction which can be given to that amendment.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], in his opening argument in support of this bill, declared that this Congress ought in good faith to carry out the provisions of the eighteenth amendment. The eighteenth amendment provides:

> The manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

And I find that the distinguished gentlemen who are advocating this bill are devoting the great burden of their arguments to an effort to convince Congress that a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol was intended to be included in that language. If Congress intended to include the mild and nonintoxicating wines and beverages when it passed the resolution containing the eighteenth amendment, then why did it not say so? If it intended to prohibit nonintoxicating wines and beverages instead of "intoxicating liquors," then why did it write into the resolution the words, "The manufacture, sale, and transportation of 'intoxicating liquors' in the United States is hereby prohibited"?

If Congress intended to include mild wines and beers that are not intoxicating and intended to be fair with the great mass of the American people, then why did it not write into that constitutional amendment the provision, "All liquors, wines and beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol or more are hereby prohibited," and give the American people the chance to know what Congress was about to do and what it intended to do?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman contend that 2¾ per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I contend that I am not prepared to tell, and you are not prepared to tell, and it is a matter which only the courts of this country are prepared to decide. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Why is it, then, that the prohibition States do not permit it if it is not intoxicating?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Are you afraid to trust the courts of this country on that question?

Mr. COOPER. It is a fact that prohibition States do not permit beer with 2¾ per cent alcohol.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The gentleman from Ohio has not answered my question. He knows, and every man on this floor knows, that this Congress has no right to do anything except as it has authority from the Constitution of the United States. Its powers are limited to the provisions of that Constitution. If we want to deal fairly with the American people, why do we not follow the provisions of the eighteenth amendment and strike out the first section of this bill, which attempts to define as intoxicating liquor something which is not intoxicating, and let the courts of this country determine what is intoxicating liquor? They are equipped to do that.

We undertake to say in this bill that for the purposes of this law any beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating. There is no evidence to show that such is a fact, and every reasonable man knows that is not the fact. If this Congress has the right to reach out beyond the provisions of the eighteenth amendment and take the mild wines and beverages which are not intoxicating away from the family in the home; if this Congress has the right to define for the courts the term "intoxicating liquors," then the next Congress has just as much right to pass a law saying that any beverage containing 50 per cent of alcohol or less is not intoxicating and thus throw down the bars in the face of the Constitution. It takes a law to enforce an amendment, and when there is no law to punish for selling a liquor containing 50 per cent of alcohol or less that portion of the amendment becomes ineffective.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Where a legislative body attempts to provide a punishment for a crime such as murder or burglary or arson, is it not proper that the legislative body should at the same time state what are the ingredients that constitute the offense?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And we are providing the offense for the sale of "intoxicating liquor."

Mr. BLANTON. And you must tell what intoxicating liquor is.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Do you undertake in the law to define all the varieties of evidence which may constitute burglary?

Mr. BLANTON. We insert the ingredients of the crime.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. But are you afraid of the courts? You know that one-half of 1 per cent alcohol is not intoxicating. Are you afraid to trust the courts to pass upon that question?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am not afraid.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you are not afraid to trust the courts of this country, why do you attempt to dictate to them what their decision shall be?

Mr. BLANTON. Because otherwise you would have a court in New York holding one thing and another court in Illinois holding another thing, and another court in Florida holding a still different thing. Therefore it is necessary to give a proper guard to the court in order to produce uniformity.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And the Supreme Court of the United States would then decide it for all the courts in the land.

The fallacy of this method of determining the question of what constitutes "intoxicating liquors" was demonstrated yesterday. The gentleman from Minnesota came in with a delightful story about a seance he had down here with a pharmacopœia in some drug store. He gave us the details of the beautiful theories which he worked out about how much alcohol he could find in 100 glasses of beer. I do not think that a prohibitionist like the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota knows anything about what is intoxicating. We ought to have a court or tribunal, qualified and equipped with the necessary machinery to investigate and determine questions of fact, and to decide what kind of liquor or beverage is in fact intoxicating. Our system of government never intended that the legislatures should go into and thrash out and decide such questions of fact.

I will tell you what you are doing by this bill: When you undertake by an act of Congress to define the term "intoxicating liquors" you make it a political question for all time to come. [Applause.]

I have heard it charged that the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] did not draw the bill; that it was drawn by the attorney for the Antisaloon League.

Mr. BLANTON. And it could not have been drawn by a better authority in the land. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I agree with the gentleman from Texas to this extent, that he could never have made a better plan to make a perpetual job for himself as attorney for that league. The very minute you pass to the courts the question of determining what constitutes "intoxicating liquors" you end for all time the political side of this question. But when you leave with Congress the power to decide this question you make it a political question which will be an issue in every campaign, and the Antisaloon League and its attorneys will go on and flourish forever.

Mr. BLANTON. When we pass this bill the Antisaloon League will go out of business.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order against the gentleman from Texas. He ought to know the rules of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman who has the floor is not objecting. It is somebody else who is objecting.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows the proper procedure.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman who has the floor has not made any protest.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DENISON). The point of order is sustained. The gentleman must observe the rules of the House.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. There are those who attempt to argue that a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume is intoxicating, but it is not so, and the best authorities in the country say that it is not so, and it can not be made so even by an act of Congress. In this connection permit me to call your attention to the opinions of some of the ablest and most trustworthy medical men in the land.

Dr. John Marshall, of Pennsylvania, who for more than 20 years has been a professor of chemistry and toxicology in the Medical School of the University of Pennsylvania, who has studied in the greatest medical schools in this country and in Europe, while testifying upon this subject, declared that wine and beer containing two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight are not intoxicating. After detailing long and extensive experiments, which he had made for the purpose of determining the effect of alcohol upon the human body, he said:

In view of the foregoing I consider that beer with an alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight, is not an intoxicating beverage.

Dr. William J. Geis, formerly an instructor in the scientific department of Yale University, and now a professor of biological chemistry in the School of Medicine of Columbia University, who for years has studied the effects of alcohol upon the human body, while testifying upon this subject and after detailing at great length the results of his experiments and study, said:

I am, therefore, of the opinion that beer of alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent by weight, is not an intoxicating beverage.

Dr. Hobart A. Hare, a professor of therapeutics, materia medica, and diagnosis, of the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia, and who for 28 years has been a visiting physician at the Jefferson Hospital and other hospitals in Pennsylvania, after more than 30 years of study and experiment with respect to the effect of alcohol upon the human body, while under oath stated:

From my personal experience and observation and consideration of the literature on the subject, I am of the opinion that beer containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating.

Not only do the great scientists and students of medicine, instructors in the great universities in this country, tell us that a beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating, but to the same effect we have the opinions of great practicing physicians, whose judgments are based upon wide experience.

Dr. Stephen P. Jewett, a graduate of Clark University, of Massachusetts, and of Buffalo University Medical School, who has served as an interne in the Metropolitan Hospital on Blackwells Island, who was assistant attending physician at the Buffalo Hospital, and attending physician at the Welcome Hall Hospital at Buffalo, who was resident physician at the River Crest Sanitarium at Astoria, Long Island, and who for the past three years has been the physician in charge of the alcoholic wards of Bellevue Hospital in New York City, and who is a noted writer upon alcoholism and drug addiction, while testifying under oath said:

During all my experience at the various institutions and hospitals with which I have been connected, both as interne and as physician, I have never known of any case of a person being admitted to such institutions suffering from alcoholism where such condition had been produced because of the drinking of beer. From my personal experience and from observations and researches made by me, I am of the opinion that beer or any beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating.

Dr. Frank A. McGuire, who graduated from the medical department of New York University, who for eight years was assistant attending physician in the Demilt Dispensary in New York City and for five years was visiting physician in the Northeastern District Dispensary of New York City, who for five years was visiting physician in the workhouse and penitentiary on Blackwells Island, and who was attending physician at Harlem district prison and at the fourth district prison of New York and at the fifth district prison of New York, and who for the past 15 years has been visiting physician at the New York City prison, commonly called the Toombs, and who is evidently as well qualified by experience and observation to know the effect of alcohol upon the human system as any other man in this country, while testifying upon this subject said:

I have come in contact during my practice with over 25,000 cases in which the effect of alcohol was an element. In my opinion as a physician, which is based especially upon my long experience in dealing with cases of inebriation, I am of the opinion that the beer now made, and which contains not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, is not intoxicating.

Dr. Moses Keschner, a practicing physician, residing in the Borough of Manhattan, a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York and an interne at the health department of New York City, who has been a visiting physician at the department of correction of New York City, who was a physician at the penitentiary in Kings County, N. Y., and Manhattan City Prison, and who has been and is now attending physician at the city prison in Brooklyn, and who has been an attending neurologist on Blackwells Island, and who has had extensive opportunity to study the effect of alcohol upon the human system, while testifying upon this subject said:

In the city prison of Brooklyn I see about 2,000 patients a year suffering from some phase of alcoholism. It has been a part of my duty to treat these cases, and as part of my diagnosis I have to ascertain what the patient has been drinking. Since the advent of beer, which is now made and which contains, as I am informed and verily believe, not to exceed 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight, I have not found a single case of intoxication from such beer. From my study, investigation, and personal experience I am of the opinion that such beer is not intoxicating.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman claim that Congress has not the power to say that one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If Congress can do what it is proposed to do here, it can abolish any per cent whatever, and if it has a right to do that then the next Congress can come along and permit the manufacture and sale of a liquor containing 50 per cent or more.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield,

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I yield to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. In the first part of the definition they have specified certain things as intoxicating without any reference to whether they contain any alcohol or not.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; they have done that.

Not only do the great scientists and physicians, out of the abundance of their experience and vast knowledge, obtained by a close study of this question, tell us that a wine or beverage containing 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating, but the Allied Medical Association of America, representing all the schools of medicine in the United States, in convention assembled on the 17th day of June, this year, passed a resolution declaring that beer and mild wines is absolutely essential in the treatment of certain medical cases, and they declared further that beer containing 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol is not only beneficial to humanity at large, but that it is admirably adaptable as a substitute for strong and alcoholic drinks and many so-called soft drinks which the members of that association declared they could not recommend without reservation. The resolution above referred to reads, as follows:

The Allied Medical Association of America in convention assembled is convinced of the necessity of properly brewed beer in the treatment of certain patients to whom the mildly stimulating and nourishing properties of such beer are absolutely essential. Furthermore, the so-called war beers as brewed at present containing not to exceed 2¾ per cent of alcohol are not only beneficial to humanity at large but are also admirably adapted as a substitute for stronger alcoholic drinks and as a variant for the many kinds of so-called soft drinks on the market, all of which can not be recommended without reservations. This association also recommends and indorses grape products, light wines, if pure, as beneficial to our patients in many conditions as both a stimulant and medicine and as a measure to prevent the increased use of narcotics.

Thus we have the judgment of the medical profession of this country not only that mild wine and beer containing 2¾ per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating, but we have their advice that it is wholesome and healthful to humanity at large. Are we going to utterly ignore their advice? When pestilence or disease spreads over the land we look to them to save us, and when we are afflicted we call upon them and trust our lives in their hands. Shall we now totally disregard their judgment in a matter which they tell us means health and happiness to humanity?

Who will be benefited by prohibition of the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating beverages? Nobody but the manufacturers of Coca-Cola, sarsaparilla, and root beer, and to them it means millions. The manufacturers of these concoctions are little concerned about the prohibition of liquors containing a high per cent of alcohol, but it is competition from wholesome and healthful beverages, such as mild wines and beer, which they fear, and they will be thrilled with delight if they can induce Congress to serve them by giving them a monopoly in the sale of their concoctions in the restaurants, cafés, and refreshment parlors of the country.

Furthermore, as shown by the resolution, it is the consensus of opinion of the Allied Medical Association of America that prohibition will increase the number of opium addicts in the United States and that mild wines and beer will minimize that danger. In this connection, permit me to call your attention to a report recently made by a committee of able and distinguished men appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury on March 25, 1918, to investigate the traffic in narcotic drugs in the United States. The following-named persons comprised the membership of that committee:

Hon. Henry T. Rainey, Member of this House; Dr. Reid Hunt, professor of pharmacology of Harvard University; Mr. B. S. Keith, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States; and Dr. A. G. Du Mez, of the United States Public Health Service.

A committee of more capable and impartial men could not have been found. And after a thorough and painstaking investigation lasting more than a year this committee made a report, which is now on file in the Treasury Department, in which they estimate that there are to-day in this country more than 1,000,000 opium addicts, and that these unfortunates are expending annually more than $61,000,000 for this drug. And they find that prohibition is one of the principal causes of opium addiction, and upon this subject the committee in its report said:

The consensus of opinion of those interested in the subject appears to be to the effect that the number of addicts will increase as soon as the prohibition laws are enforced. These opinions are based for the most part on the theory that drinkers will seek a substitute for alcohol, and that the opiates and cocaine will be found to be the most satisfactory for that purpose. This opinion apparently receives some support from investigations made in some of the Southern States where prohibition has been in effect for some years.

One of the most radical laws ever placed upon the statute books in this country was the Harrison Act, intended to prohibit the importation and illegitimate use of opium, and yet in spite of the stringent provisions made for its enforcement, and with the powerful machinery of this Government for investigation and prosecution in full swing, the use of opium and cocaine has steadily increased. As bearing upon this point, permit me to quote the following from the report of the narcotic committee:

From the data obtained the committee is convinced that there is a nation-wide use of narcotic drugs for other than legitimate medical needs, and that such use for the satisfaction of addiction has materially increased in certain sections of the country despite the vigorous efforts exerted in the past four years in the enforcement of the anti-narcotic law, and in the enforcement of laws of the States and municipalities which have enacted such laws for the control of habit-forming drugs.

Opium is not native to this country but has to be imported, and the greatest retarding force to the importation of opium has been the restriction of commerce due to the war, and yet in spite of the enforcement of the Harrison Act and the restraining force of the war the illegitimate consumption of opium in the United States has increased until to-day we are consuming more than 10 times as much opium as any other country in the world with the possible exception of China, and China is a sober country.

As bearing upon this point I shall again quote from the report of the narcotic committee:

A comparison of the per capita consumption of opium in this country with that of other countries indicates that this country consumes from 13 to 72 times as much opium per capita as is consumed by any other country.

With a condition like this staring us in the face what do you think will happen in this country if prohibition is put in force and trade with the Orient is opened up? I am told that the wardens of our penitentiaries are expecting that their prisons will be filled with dope fiends if prohibition becomes effective.

In the face of these conditions, when our scientists and physicians tell us that mild wines and beer are not only nonintoxicating, but that they are wholesome and healthful, and when they warn us that the prohibition of these mild drinks will increase the use of narcotic drugs, don't you think that we should hesitate before ignoring that warning?

The advocates of this bill tell us that alcohol in any quantity is injurious to the human body, and yet they permit its use in patent medicines and authorize physicians to prescribe whisky containing 90 per cent of alcohol for the sick, thereby recognizing its value as a medicine. If a liquor containing 90 per cent of alcohol is helpful to a human being whose vitality is low and whose constitution is weakened by affliction, then how can it be said that a wine or beverage containing not more than two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol can be injurious to the strong and vigorous and the healthy?

If one would believe all that he hears while listening to the arguments of the champions of this bill, he would conclude that the greatest enemy known to the human race is alcohol, and yet we know that alcohol is ever present in the body of every healthy and normal man. Even the zealous champions of this bill carry it constantly in their systems. It is one of the results of the digestion and assimilation of food we eat. While testifying upon this subject Dr. Hobart Hare, professor in the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, one of the most distinguished authorities on alcohol in the country, said:

There is produced in the human body every day certain quantities of alcohol, not infinitesimal, but in very definite amount, and for this reason alcohol can be considered as being at all times present in the human body. The alcohol is produced principally, if not entirely, by fermentation processes in the intestinal tube. It is absorbed and is contained in the fluids and tissues of the body in general. It appears therefore that the body is accustomed daily to the utilization or oxidation of a certain per cent of alcohol which is utilized or oxidized in exactly the same manner as alcohol produced outside of the body and then swallowed in ordinary quantities. For these reasons alcohol can not be considered as a foreign substance to which the tissues are entirely unaccustomed, and the effects which it produces are governed entirely by the quantity ingested and the ability of the body to deal with a substance with which it is qualified to deal.

Not only is alcohol native to the human body, it is native to this country; in fact, it is native to every country where man lives. It is created by nature's processes during the fermentation of almost every food of which we partake; and if this bill becomes a law every farmer who takes cider from his apples or juice from his grapes will have to be constantly upon his guard lest Mother Nature, while he is unaware, drags him into the toils of the law. And if Christ should come again and should conduct Himself as He did at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee, the advocates of this bill would throw Him into jail.

Why go to extremes? We have grown to be the greatest Nation on earth with whisky and brandy and rum available to everyone, and now "with one fell swoop" we propose to abolish not only intoxicating liquors but to include therewith nonintoxicating wines and beverages. We propose to deprive the farmer of a profitable market for his barley and hops, to destroy vast vineyards, to throw thousands of men out of employment, to deprive the people of liberties which they have enjoyed through all ages, thereby creating widespread industrial unrest, with which this country will have to deal. And we accomplish nothing except to insure to the manufacturers of coca-cola, sarsaparilla, and root beer millions in profits by giving them a monopoly upon a market which they could not otherwise hope to control. Yes; we accomplish one thing more. We step out of the line of other great civilized nations and take our place alongside the "Terrible Turk," the only other prohibition nation on earth.

To the other nations of the world we boast of our strength of character and of our manhood, and yet by the provisions of this bill we confess to the whole world that our people are a lot of weaklings, with such appetites for overindulgence that they can not be trusted even to enjoy a drink which is not only nonintoxicating but which the best physicians in the land tell us is both wholesome and healthful.

I have been amazed at the extravagant claims made by the advocates of this bill as to the amount of sentiment supporting its radical provisions. As a matter of fact, the eighteenth amendment was adopted under the stress and excitement of war, at a time when a patriotic people were willing to conserve food and to make any sacrifice to help win the war, at a time when 4,000,000 of our boys were defending our flag in a battle for democracy, and at a time when they were engaged in military operations, where their voices could not be heard upon this question. And little did our people then know that while our breweries and distilleries were closed and while we were eating brown bread in limited quantities in order to conserve food for our Allies, the breweries and distilleries in Europe were running at full blast, consuming the food which we were conserving. And while the advocates of this bill, the self-appointed keepers of the health and morals of our soldiers, were taking advantage of the country's misfortune to press their favorite issue, our boys over in France, with brandy and cognac freely available to them, were fighting the Nation's battles and marching on to victory.

Do you think that the American soldier, who possessed sufficient character and self-control to grow up to a strong and powerful manhood with whisky and brandy and rum at all times available to him, who went to France and endured the hardships of war, ready, if need be, to sacrifice his life for democracy, who sprang from the trenches and went over the top amidst the thunder of cannon and the bursting of shells, who had cognac and other strong drinks within his reach every day he was in France, will regard it as a compliment to his record as a soldier or to his strength of character as a man if we tell him by an act of Congress that we fear that a wine or beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is dangerous to him, and that he now has not enough strength of character or manhood to endure such a temptation?

We have heard innumerable speeches upon this floor about the wonderful growth and development of this country and about the marvelous character and achievements of its people. We have heard of the courage and chivalry of our soldiers in France, and we have declared them the most fearless soldiers who entered the war. We have declared their alertness and physical fitness superior to all others, and yet all these things were accomplished while whisky and gin and rum containing a high per cent of alcohol were available to every inhabitant in the land. Still we hear it proclaimed by the advocates of this bill that our civilization will be endangered and our development retarded if we indulge our people in the liberty of enjoying a wine or a beverage containing two and three-quarters per cent of alcohol.

Do you think that the 4,000,000 soldiers who rallied to our country's call in its hour of dire distress are entitled to be heard upon this question? I challenge you to leave it to them. I have talked with hundreds of boys returning from Europe and with many more from the camps in this country, and I find that the unanimous sentiment among them is against the prohibition of mild wines and beer. I have read letters from many soldiers still in France and in the army of occupation in Germany, and I have found therein a prevailing protest against the action of the advocates of prohibition taking advantage of their absence to force a change in our Constitution which alters so radically the habits of living among our people. I recall the expression of one soldier referring to this subject, which is fairly representative of that protest. He said:

> We left our homes and our loved ones and came across the seas and endured the dangers and hardships of war to fight for democracy in Europe, and while our backs were turned they took our liberty from us at home.

What patriotic American, conscious of the courage and chivalry of these brave boys, can turn deaf ears to such protests? What fair-minded man will refuse to hear them before the final decision is made?

The American Legion, comprised of soldiers who participated in the European war, representing every section of the Union, assembled not long ago, and while their convention was preliminary to a national organization, and while their call prohibited the adopting of resolutions or the taking of any official action until their organization should be perfected, yet resolutions were offered upon questions in which they felt a vital interest, and which were evidently intended to convey their views to the country. A resolution was offered upon this question, which reads as follows:

> Whereas while the country's sons were fighting for democracy abroad, advantage was taken of our absence by a certain doctrinaire element, who appear to be more interested in prohibition than in winning the war: Therefore, be it
> Resolved, That this proposed organization of veterans protest most emphatically against this legislation concerning which our wishes were not consulted and which is opposed in letter and spirit to our experience abroad; be it further
> Resolved, That we demand that all pending prohibitory legislation be set aside until a referendum of the people shall have been held, and that pending the determination of same, the manufacture and sale of beer and mild wines be continued, and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

And yet, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] warned us yesterday to look out for the people, and said that the people were demanding this bill with all its drastic provisions. I say to you that I know as a matter of fact that the representatives of the prohibition organization in this country went to certain legislatures and to members of various legislatures, and when they were interrogated by the committee as to whether or not the eighteenth amendment would prevent the manufacture of cider and mild wines in the homes of this country they replied, "Of course it will not. Congress can not go any further than the Constitution permits, and the Constitution plainly says intoxicating liquors." But now that they have won the victory, gentlemen, they come here and try to fasten upon the people of this country something that they never anticipated, and something that they had a right not to expect.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] talks about the overwhelming sentiment, and I have heard gentlemen on the floor of this House hammer organized labor over the head. The other day I heard an attack made upon labor upon this floor because its representatives had the courage to come to the steps of this Capitol and protest against the passage of a law depriving the plain people of the liberty of enjoying nonintoxicating wines and beverages. Has the time come in this country when the plain people can not protest to the Congress of the United States against the enactment of laws interfering with something which they believe is right and just, and which, in their judgment, is a matter of personal liberty to them?

Then I have heard it said that the laboring men of this country are in favor of prohibiting the manufacture of mild wines and beer, and that in the face of the fact that the representatives of organized labor only two weeks ago assembled 30,500 strong, and 26,500 of that number went on record protesting against the prohibition of mild wines and beer. All we ask, all that organized labor asks, all that the plain people of this country ask, is that Congress carry out in good faith the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, no less and no more.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a short statement?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; if it is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. COOPER. Here is a short statement from Mr. Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers——

Mr. DYER. This is coming out of the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Then I can not yield for that. Now, take the question about the people being so strongly back of this bill. I will tell you. The American people have never had an opportunity to pass on the question of mild wines and beer. Gentlemen talk about the demands of the people as shown by the adoption of this constitutional amendment. The American people never ratified the amendment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] says that the fact that it was so overwhelmingly adopted justifies us in going to any length. I will give you an illustration: On the 5th of last November the people of Missouri voted on the question of constitutional prohibition. They voted against its adoption by 75,000 majority. And yet the legislature, elected by the same people on that same day, assembled a few days later and, under the whip of the Anti-Saloon League, ratified this amendment, and I am told that California had a similar experience. If that is democracy, the people of this country do not know what the term means.

I have heard it charged by some who favor prohibition that there are those who will defy the eighteenth amendment, and the advocates of this bill, by the drastic provisions which they have inserted for its enforcement and the unlimited authority which they have given to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the employment of assistants, special agents, and inspectors, and the unlimited millions which they have authorized him to expend, show clearly that they expect the people of this country to violate the provisions of this bill if it is enacted into law. If you want the people to respect the eighteenth amendment, then let Congress, by its legislation, carry out in good faith the provisions of that amendment. Let us pass laws prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors without interfering with the liberty of the people in enjoying nonintoxicating wines and beverages.

While a great mass of the American people do not believe in prohibition, yet if they are permitted to use a mild wine or a beverage they will adjust themselves to the new condition of things, and they will obey the law. But the American people believe in liberty and cherish freedom, and when Congress enacts laws which so seriously interfere with their conception of liberty they are tempted to disregard such laws, and when you tempt people to disregard one law you weaken their respect for all laws.

We who oppose the drastic provisions of this bill respect the law, and we want to see all laws respected and enforced. We deplore "blue laws" upon our statute books. And when we read testimonials from officials in Kansas, Oklahoma, and Colorado as to the blessings of prohibition we are distressed to find from the records of the United States internal-revenue collector that during the past 10 years of prohibition in Kansas $210,590 have been collected for liquor dealers' licenses issued in that State, and every dollar which went into a license probably represents the sale of twenty times that amount in strong drink, not including the "bootlegging," which persistent rumor convinces one has prevailed there. And the records of the United States revenue collector show that 8,781 liquor dealers' licenses have been issued in Oklahoma during the past 10 years of prohibition, while the records of the same office show that the inhabitants of Colorado have paid $12,700 for liquor dealers' licenses during the past two years of prohibition. It may be argued that such licenses were procured in order to dispense whisky for medicinal purposes; but if so, then the people of these States must regard whisky as a marvelous medicine. If the people of this country are permitted to use a wholesome and healthful mild wine or beverage, they will not disobey the law to procure intoxicating liquors. But mild wines and beverages are not manufactured in violation of law, and the test of prohibition in this country shows that it is strong and inferior liquors in which "bootleggers" deal.

Local self-government has been a cardinal principle in this country since the days of the Revolution, and every State in this Union was admitted with a guaranty of that right. There is no excuse for the existence of separate States unless the right of self-government is conferred upon them, and yet the provisions of this bill are intended to deprive every local community in the land of its right of self-government in deciding for itself what kind of a nonintoxicating drink its people may enjoy. If the people of Oklahoma or Colorado or Kansas want to deprive themselves of the enjoyment of a harmless and nonintoxicating beverage, that is their privilege, but I protest against the right of the people of those States to say to the people of the State in which I live that we shall not be given liberty of enjoying that privilege if we so decide.

When in the legislative history of this country has a law ever been proposed with provisions so severe or terms so drastic as the one now under consideration? It jeopardizes the property of every landlord to confiscation, if his tenants manufacture thereon a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. It violates that sacred rule of the presumption of innocence which has always surrounded American citizens when accused of crime, and shifts the burden of proof from the accuser to the accused. It compels American citizens to give testimony incriminating themselves. It gives special powers to revenue agents and inspectors and clothes them with authority to institute and conduct prosecutions. It makes no provision for a change of venue from a biased and prejudiced commissioner and gives no assurance of a jury trial. And, worst of all, it provides for a special form of indictment, which does not sufficiently inform the accused of the charges made against him to enable him to make an intelligent defense. Yes; and more, it authorizes a court to compel a citizen to give bond in the sum of $5,000 as a guaranty that he will not commit crime and empowers the court to commit him to jail if he is unable to give such bond. What legislator who does not believe that the measure which he proposes runs counter to the will of the people would propose such provisions and penalties?

The framers of this bill have shown wonderful diligence in providing for bonds, and affidavits, and records, and special agents and inspectors, and unlimited funds for its enforcement. And they have thrown the most stringent regulations around physicians whom they have authorized to prescribe whisky, but they have made one dreadful oversight. They have failed to require the patient for whom whisky is prescribed to give bond to insure that he will take it according to directions. Of course, we would never be so unkind as to suspect that any of the advocates of this bill ever expect to be patients.

When one comprehends the revolutionary, drastic, and oppressive provisions of this bill, and the enormous sums of the people's money to be expended for its enforcement, he begins to wonder whether, in the light of the freedom for which this Government was founded, in the memory of the liberties which our people have enjoyed, in the name of democracy for which our soldiers fought, it can be possible that such intolerance is about to be written into the laws of our land.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I am just a little bit surprised that any Congressman should take the position that this body has no authority to define a crime in undertaking to enforce a constitutional provision. I do not think there is any question in the world but that it is entirely proper that this body should define a crime. I am not in a position to argue with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] that this body knows as much about what liquors are intoxicating as judges do, but I think this body's duty, even though they may be more or less ignorant on the subject of intoxicating liquors, is to define crime. [Laughter and applause.]

I have lived in a dry State for a good many years, and I have the distinction of coming from the original bone-dry State. These arguments are old to me. The proposition of whether we can enforce prohibition without the State legislature and the American Congress acting concurrently reminds me of the old days when the well-paid brewers' attorneys used to come out to Kansas and tell us how they loved the Constitution, and that for that reason we could not have prohibition. [Laughter and applause.] They were well paid, and they often succeeded. For many years they made us believe that in order to have prohibition we must have fair enforcement laws, reasonable enforcement laws. How familiar those terms are to the old Kansan!

What they meant by fair enforcement laws and reasonable enforcement laws were laws that they could evade and that we could not enforce. That was the condition in Kansas for many years. We had a governor named St. John, who decided that the saloon must go, but do not think that liquor went with the saloon. For many years it did not go and was sold all over Kansas. But there came a time when we adopted laws which we call real enforcement laws, something like the bill suggested by the chairman of this committee. They were pronounced unreasonable, and great advertisements were carried in the daily papers telling how unreasonable they were, but no man living in Kansas to-day is complaining of those laws that for more than five years have enabled us to enforce the liquor law. [Applause.] Still this bill is not half drastic enough. [Laughter.] Oh, I mean that, because as long as you permit a doctor to write a prescription permitting a man to buy liquor you will have men using liquor for beverage purposes. We cut that out, and no man is complaining of it in our State to-day. This bill is not half as drastic as the Kansas prohibitory liquor law, and I do not know but that we get along out there just about as well and are just about as healthy as most of you. I will tell you what we have done. We have got more empty poorhouses in Kansas than in any State in the Union. [Applause.] One hundred and five—and more than 90 per cent of them unoccupied to-day.

We have more laboring men who give their boys and girls a four years' course in the high schools, so far as percentage goes, than any State in the Union to-day, and we have more home owners in proportion to our population than there are in any State in the Union to-day. I heard a man from New York the other day, a Member of Congress, say that we fellows from out there ought not to be presumptuous and talk much; that one or more of the congressional districts of New York had less than 100,000 population; that we represented small districts. I got hold of the Congressional Directory to-day to look him up. He represents a part of a county in New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What district is that in New York in which there is less than 100,000? I come from New York.

Mr. TINCHER. It is less than one county, while I represent a district of 32 counties and have over 300,000 constituents, with over 90,000 voters, and that district has more home owners in it than any district in the State of New York. [Applause.]

I do not intend to deal in any glittering generalities, but wish to mention some cold facts.

Coming from Kansas, the original home of bone-dry prohibition, I am constrained to make a few peaceful remarks in favor of this legislation. I feel sure the bill is going to pass, but if I can allay the fears of a few Members on their version of the ultimate results, I shall be satisfied.

Once upon a time there was a governor of Kansas named St. John. He was determined that the saloon must go, and it went; then for years Kansas listened to the brewers' and distillers' propaganda that we must have reasonable enforcement laws. For years in Kansas the liquor question was a political one. The Democratic State platform always carried what was known as the "resubmission plank." I can well remember, when the tendency started to pass real instead of "reasonable" enforcement laws, how, when the liquor dealers and interests were driven out of the larger cities, those who had advocated reasonable enforcement laws said the cities would be ruined, the buildings would be vacant, and the city treasuries empty. What are the facts? Every city has gone right ahead, every building is filled, every man has work.

There are some changes. The laboring man uses his beer money to buy a home; he educates his children. The bank deposits of the laboring man has increased; his family spend their vacation with him, riding in his car, and, in short, they are enjoying the comforts procurable with the money that used to go to Anheuser-Busch, Pabst, Edelweiss, and other noted persons.

For several years now all parties in Kansas have been for prohibition, and the only rivalry is as to which party can pass the strongest law when in power.

Talk about the effect of liquor on crime, the gentleman from Massachusetts must have been joking; more than an average of one-half of the county jails of Kansas have been empty for five years, and when the State of Missouri goes dry three-fourths of the balance of them will be empty, as most of the occupants now are poor fellows from Massachusetts and New York and Missouri who have been caught trying to bring liquor into the State for sale. Talk about the effect of prohibition on crime, our population in Kansas has doubled in a generation, still our penitentiary has only one-half the occupants it had when we started to have real prohibition. Oh, yes; let me give you something more. Kansas, with 105 counties, with 105 county farms or poorhouses, how many of these do you suppose have occupants? I do not want to overstate this, so I will use round numbers. More than 90 per cent of the farms have not a single charge. Compare that with any saloon State. I will say this: If every county in any State in the Union had open saloons, there would not be an empty poorhouse in that State.

To the committee in charge of the bill I have only this to say: Your bill is not drastic enough, and, mark my words, every Congress will pass a little more drastic measure, and after this session those bills will be prepared by the enforcement officers, handed to the committee, and passed by acclamation.

The gentleman from Boston, I think, suggested that the campaigns for Congress would in the future be on whether you favored one-half of 1 per cent or a larger per cent. If that thing is ever mentioned after the people—the American people—try prohibition, after all the mothers get to voting, you mark my guess, there will be no one for increasing the per cent. Wait until the brewers and distillers of this generation are not assured of the workingman's nickels and dimes to create propaganda with and there will be no more parades. "No beer, no work," will be a thing of the past.

Mr. Chairman of the committee, do not let anyone weaken you on the extract proposition; there are ways to keep the extracts without the use of alcohol. Every Kansas grocer to-day sells all the extracts without alcohol.

Now, in regard to war-time prohibition, the President asked this Congress to repeal it in so far as it applied to beer and light wines. I am not sure that I know what he means by light wine, but I do know that our answer ought to be to pass a law to compel this prohibition until the general law takes effect. Some Kansas mothers have been accused of electing the President. Those same Kansas mothers have sons that went into the war "that we wasn't kept out of." Those boys, many of them, enlisted for the duration of the war; many of those boys are still being held, and their requests for discharge are being refused. Still some would say that the Army is sufficiently demobilized to take off the ban. I know how these mothers feel. Let us say to the liquor interests to-day this Nation is dry now and for all time to come.

I wish it were possible and proper for us to say to the world in this measure that no one shall ever have the right to use American boys to police foreign nations, and especially shall this be true so long as such foreign nations use intoxicating liquors instead of water. I wish this House had the power to say that if we are forced into some international agreement where your boy and my boy may some day be compelled to go to foreign countries to take part in their wars, that we could know that he would not be subjected to the temptation while there, especially a temptation that we by law in a few hours are going to remove for all time to come in this our own beloved Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to enter into any discussion with my friend [Mr. TINCHER], who comes from the State where they always say, "What is the matter with Kansas," as to the number of good people residing in his congressional district, but I do not know of a single, solitary congressional district in the State of New York that has less than a population of 225,000 men, women, and children. I know whereof I speak, being proud to have been born and bred in dear old New York. After listening to the debate here Tuesday and to-day, I have been wondering whether my friends from the Southern States, particularly, have been realizing that the same language which is contained in the eighteenth amendment is not contained in the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution, better known as the suffrage amendment. When it is ratified—and it is going to be ratified inside of one year—those gentlemen who are arguing here to-day so strongly, and I might say effectively, because this measure is going to pass, on account of the excitement, turmoil, and confusion which has been created in the minds of many Members of Congress, will have to sit up and take notice. Its passage being accelerated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW], who does not happen to be here, but who announced that instead of being a servile follower he has become a leader, when that day comes, and it is coming very soon, the same construction you are pleading for here to-day will be placed by a Republican Congress, aye, by this Congress, on the nineteenth amendment. This Congress will go into your State and say to you who shall vote and under what conditions, and the same big, vast machine which is going to be created for enforcing the law will have its counterpart created again for the purpose of enforcing the woman-suffrage law in your own State, and I say——

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman see any analogy between the constitutional-prohibition amendment and the woman-suffrage amendment?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do. There is this analogy in this one particular: Both amendments provide that it shall be enforced by concurrent power vested in the States and vested in the Government——

Mr. HERSEY. The woman-suffrage amendment takes effect without any supplementary law, does it not?

Mr. SIEGEL. No; it does not. The same language is contained in both providing for its enforcement. As a matter of fact, I believe the language was adopted from this prohibition amendment——

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will.

Mr. HERSEY. What supplementary laws do you have to have to enforce the woman-suffrage amendment?

Mr. SIEGEL. As to the length of time in the county, the length of time in the State, and that citizens shall have the right to vote without regard to creed, color, race, or sex in those particular States where that privilege is now denied them.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Does not the woman-suffrage amendment simply say that there shall not be any discrimination as to sex?

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, no; the suffrage amendment has the same language.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will read it, I think he will find that is what it is.

Mr. SIEGEL. It gives the power of enforcement to the Government that is given under this provision in this bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Read the amendment itself.

Mr. SIEGEL. The amendment itself. The amendment is as follows:

> The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

That same section is the amendment, which simply provides for the enforcement——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Just for a question.

Mr. SIEGEL. The gentleman has asked more questions than any man in the House and has given less knowledge in return. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has spoken of the South. Will not the gentleman be fair enough to yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman from Missouri extend my time?

Mr. IGOE. I have not the time.

Mr. SIEGEL. Then I had better confine myself to my own remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will ask our friend over here, the gentleman from Minnesota, if he will extend my time for five minutes in order to answer the questions of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not.

Mr. SIEGEL. I am very sorry, but I can not yield to the gentleman.

Now, gentlemen, it was all very well and easy for Members of the House to rise here and commence to discuss questions involving the exercise of concurrent power by Congress and the several States, without citing a single case to sustain their affirmative allegations. There was a case in Oregon of Ex parte Desjeiro, One hundred and fifty-second Federal, 1004 (1907), where the court says:

> Under their respective constitutions and the acts of Congress that admitted Oregon and Washington to the Union, they have "concurrent jurisdiction" over the Columbia River. Both States passed laws by which they regulated the taking of salmon in the river. One Desjeiro was convicted of violating a statute of Oregon, which differed in the regulations and in the punishment imposed for violation thereof from the statute of Washington. In discharging the prisoner, the court said: "It is the act of concurrence between the two States in the exercise of legislative authority that validates the act and gives it the force of law, and unless there is a concurrence or assent by both States to the enactment it can not have that force."

Let us see what the United States Supreme Court said away back in 1820. Justice Washington, in reading the opinion in behalf of the court in the case of Houston against Moore, pages 1 and 23 in Fifth Wheaton, said:

> That to subject citizens to the operation of two laws upon the same subject, dictated by distinct wills, particularly in a case inflicting pains and penalties, is, to my apprehension, something very much like oppression, if not worse. In short, I am altogether incapable of comprehending how two distinct wills can, at the same time, be exercised in relation to the same subject, to be effectual, and at the same time compatible with each other. If they correspond in every respect, then the latter is idle and inoperative; if they differ, they must, in the nature of things, oppose each other so far as they do differ. If the one imposes a certain punishment for a certain offense, the presumption is that this was deemed sufficient, and, under all the circumstances, the only proper one. If the other legislatures impose a different punishment, in kind or degree, I am at a loss to conceive how they can both exist harmoniously together.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] cited a number of authorities here, but each and every one of them was a question of interstate commerce or intrastate commerce. In other words, those cases, where the United States Supreme Court sustained the prohibition statutes, such as the Webb-Kenyon Act, as to shipment of liquor from one State to another, do not determine this question. The Mississippi case is a question of what the State could do in its own jurisdiction. By this constitutional amendment you have tried to create a concurrent jurisdiction. For instance, if the State of New York was to pass certain legislation providing penalties, and Congress was to pass a law providing penalties—and this is the most drastic legislation that has ever been suggested in the history of Congress—which law is to be enforced in the State of New York? Gentlemen, you can never enforce a law unless public sentiment is behind it. It can not and never will be behind a law of this kind, which permits the Government of the United States to force you to state whether you have obtained liquor or wine or beer by due process of law. You cast the burden upon the defendant in the case under this act. And you go a step further and say it is all right for doctors to issue prescriptions. But if, perchance, you get sick while in an automobile or boat or some public conveyance, and you happen to use that wine or liquor, you are guilty under section 20 of an offense by which you can be shipped away to the penitentiary. It does not limit the number of prescriptions the various doctors can give you, nor is there any way for keeping tab on them. If a veterinary is called to treat an animal, and he requires any liquor for the animal, he has got to go to work and bring a doctor. You pretend—and I use the word advisedly—to permit the use of the wine for sacramental purposes, and yet you do not make any provision in this law for that purpose. The only provision you have made in regard to that is in section 3, where you use the language:

> Liquor for nonbeverage purposes and wine for sacramental purposes may be purchased, sold, transported, and used as herein provided.

But you do not make any provision anywhere else in the bill. At one place you say you give that right, and in the other place you simply have forgotten about it.

I could go on and point out to you the fact that the American people were fooled when this amendment went through. You went to work and did not use in this amendment the word "use," but you are now engaged in the effort to take away from our people the right to use light wines and light beers. And when the time comes, after Congress shall have passed this kind of legislation and the people of this country shall have realized what has been put over on them, they will turn to their Representatives here who have not listened to what their request was and demand an accounting. They will ask them to answer. They will ask them to explain how it is that for the first time in the history of the Republic Congress has attempted to take a question of fact which should be determined by jurors and make it a question of law to be determined by the courts. In other words, the majority of the Judiciary Committee seem to fear the American jury, seem to fear the jurors who appear in our United States courts, but seem to think that they can put it up to the courts to carry out the legal formula of what constitutes intoxication. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, we heard this afternoon what seemed to me to be a very remarkable confession. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] got up here and told us that when he was on the Committee on the Judiciary they were very solicitous to insert this language, "The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this amendment by appropriate legislation," and then under the questioning of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] he disclosed to you what in his opinion the effect of that language would be, namely, that the State legislature and Congress must both act or prohibition legislation will not be effective; that any State that failed to pass prohibition legislation will not be affected by the amendment to the Constitution.

It seems to me a remarkable, and I have no doubt inadvertent, confession for the gentleman to make here, to the effect that Congress and his committee perpetrated such a ghastly and hideous joke upon the American people. The people of the United States voted for this eighteenth amendment because they thought that it would prohibit the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquor throughout the entire country. They did not believe that it would be necessary for the State government to act in conjunction with the Federal Government in order to prohibit it. If they had any such understanding, would they not have preferred to vote for some such language as this, "That the several States shall have the power to enforce national prohibition by legislation supplementary to acts of Congress"? There was not the slightest necessity for any such an amendment, and the people would never have voted for it. The States did not need any congressional legislation, and they did not need any constitutional amendment in order to vote themselves dry. What they did need, what they did demand, and what they thought they were voting for and getting was to prevent liquor from being sold across the line in another State. But if the amendment does mean what the gentleman now contends that it means, would it not have been the fair and reasonable and honorable course for the Committee on the Judiciary, which brought this amendment out, to have used some such language as that, instead of this language, which gave everybody in the country the idea that it did and would prohibit intoxicating liquor? Of course, the real answer is simply that nobody, in Congress or out of it, ever supposed that the language actually adopted would be capable of the construction which it is now attempted to put upon it.

But I am not going to discuss the effect of the word "concurrent" further, because I have something else to say in reply to another argument.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VAILE. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Assuming that this Congress passes the bill which is now before us, and that one of the States passes a measure quite different with regard to the penalties, which statute would you enforce, assuming that there was a violation of the law?

Mr. VAILE. That question, I think, was fully discussed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] a few minutes ago, a majority of the authorities holding that the more severe penalty must be enforced.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Where do you find the authorities for that proposition?

Mr. VAILE. Some were cited by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. VAILE. No; I regret I can not yield. I want to reply to another argument made by a Member from the gentleman's side of the case. We heard on Tuesday an interesting argument on the subject of the jurisdiction of Congress to pass such legislation, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] argued very ingeniously that Congress has not any right to pass such legislation as this, because the provision of the amendment forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicants does not come into effect until January 16, 1920.

Both the gentleman's distinguished ability and the predicament in which he finds himself remind us of the late Judge Cooley, for many years the presiding justice of the Supreme Court of Michigan, who finally retired from the bench and resumed the private practice of law. On the first several occasions of his appearance as an advocate in the court over which he had formerly presided, the decisions of that court were adverse to him, and he expressed his annoyance on one occasion to the then presiding chief justice, who remarked:

> Counsel must remember that his very eminence attracts desperate cases and desperate cases require desperate arguments.

Undoubtedly the forces opposed to the passage of this act have chosen their most able advocate to make the argument which was presented to us on Tuesday touching the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. But I for one can not sit still when the challenge is thrown out that no lawyer can assert that Congress has such jurisdiction.

It will be observed that this law relates to two separate subjects matter: First, regulations and definitions applicable to the war-time prohibition act and certain modifications and amendments of that act; second, enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Now, the gentleman argued, in regard to the war-time prohibition act, that that act was passed as a war measure, that the emergency is over, and that the justification for the act has therefore ceased. I submit that if the argument is as technical as that, it must be subjected to a technical test, the technical test being suggested by his very argument, namely, that the war, as a matter of technicality, is not yet over, and it will not be over until the Senate of the United States has ratified the treaty. It may or may not ratify the treaty in its present form, but in any event——

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. I can not yield further. Congress in this part of the pending bill is only passing confirmatory legislation concerning a law which is now in effect, the constitutionality of which has not been questioned, and which must continue in effect for some months, that is, until peace has been declared and demobilization is completed.

Now, as to the other proposition, as to the power of Congress to legislate for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, which has been questioned because that amendment does not operate to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor until January 16, 1920.

Very early in the history of this country, less than a score of years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, Congress passed legislation in anticipation of a constitutional amendment. The twelfth amendment to the Constitution was proposed in 1803. While it was pending, indeed before it was known that it would be ratified, which makes the case much less strong in principle, because we know that this amendment has been ratified and that it will be in effect, Congress passed legislation providing for the means of conducting elections of President and Vice President, that being the subject of the twelfth amendment. That legislation was enacted in 1804, before the amendment was ratified. Its constitutionality was never brought in question.

Our reports are full of cases where laws have been passed the effective date of which would necessarily depend upon a contingency. One such case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1813, when that court was presided over by Chief Justice Marshall, was the case of Cargo of Brig Aurora v. United States (7 Cranch, 382). In that case it appears that Congress on March 1, 1809, passed an embargo act against Great Britain and France, which act was by its terms to continue until the end of that session of Congress—May 1, 1810. Congress on the latter date passed a new embargo act providing that the former act should be revived on March 3, 1811, unless before that date Great Britain and France should revoke certain edicts, which revocations were to be announced by proclamation by the President of the United States. The question in this case was whether the embargo act was in force after the date fixed for its original termination, and the Supreme Court held that—

Congress may make the revival of an act depend upon a future event.

It is submitted that it is no more an assumption of power by Congress to enact a law than it is to revive an existing law, especially when the event which is to call it into operation is an event certain and not an event contingent. Indeed, I may pause to observe that the event is not only not contingent, it is not only an event certain, it as an event present, for the eighteenth amendment is in effect right now. The section forbidding the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicants is not yet operative, but the rest of the amendment is, especially that part of it which imposes the overwhelming moral obligation upon Congress to provide for its enforcement by appropriate legislation. That is at this moment a part of the fundamental law of the land.

To quote another early case: The Supreme Court of Connecticut, in Pratt v. Allen (13 Conn., 119, p. 124), held:

The objection is that * * * as the act of May, 1838, was prior to the final adoption of the amendment by the people, it was prior to the existence of power in the assembly, and so the act was void; in other words, that the amendment was a grant of power to the legislature to legislate upon this subject, and that until the amendment received the consummating act, by vote of the people, no power was conferred upon the legislature. * * *

In other words, the question was exactly the same as it is here, with the difference, in favor of the legislation now pending before us, that in the Connecticut case it was not known that the amendment would be ratified at all, while here it is known that the amendment has been ratified and will make the sale of liquor unlawful on a certain definite date. The Connecticut court adds:

No duty could be more imperative for legislators, sworn to support the Constitution, than to make laws to carry that Constitution into effect; and as constitutional provisions are usually conversant only with general principles, it must be the duty of the legislature to see to the details necessary to carry into effect such provisions, and this whether the amendment adopted expressly enjoins it or not.

Again, the court says (p. 126):

The act is not intended to nor does it oppose any existing article in the Constitution, but it is intended to meet and accord with its proposed substitute. We can not doubt that it is constitutional unless, indeed, this amendment restrains the power otherwise existing in the legislature.

In Galveston, etc., Railway Co. v. Gross, Commissioner General Land Office (47 Tex., 428), the Texas Supreme Court says:

We know of no rule forbidding legislation looking to the contingency of a constitutional change.

Citing Bull v. Reed (13 Grattan, 78); State v. Parker (26 Vermont, 357); State v. Kirkley (29 Maryland, 85), how much less can there be a rule forbidding legislation looking to a certainty of a constitutional change—to a certainty already translated into fact?

In the Vermont case (State v. Parker, 1854) the facts were that the prohibition act provided that it should go into effect on the second Tuesday of March, 1853, with the proviso that it be submitted to the vote of the people, and that if the majority of the vote should be "no" then the act should not go into effect until December, 1853. The vote was "yes." In the opinion that distinguished jurist and legal writer, Chief Justice Redfield (p. 363), said:

It is admitted on all hands that the legislature may enact laws the operation of which shall be made to depend upon a contingency. This could not be questioned with any show of reason or sound logic. It has been practiced in all free States for hundreds of years, and no one has been lynx-eyed enough to discover—or certainly bold enough to declare—that such legislation was on that account void or irregular. And it is * * * a singular fact that this remarkable discovery should first be made in the free representative democracies of America. And in regard to taking the sense of these same people upon the expediency of legislation, where the legislators are confessedly the mere agents and instruments of the people to express their sovereign and superior will, to save necessity of assembling the people in mass, and when from the very nature of the case the representative is in honor and good faith bound to conform his action to the will and desire of his constituents, does anyone seriously doubt the perfect propriety of the legislature, upon questions of general policy affecting equally the whole State, acting upon the known will of the State, where that is known? * * *

The rule of law laid down in the British and American Cyclopedia of Law (8 Cyc., 770) is that—statutes enacted in anticipation of the adoption of constitutional amendments prescribing the manner of giving effect to such amendments in accordance with directory provisions thereof * * * are valid, in the absence of constitutional provisions prohibiting such legislation.

Here, far from having constitutional provisions prohibiting such legislation, we have one in effect at this moment which imposes at least a moral obligation to enact it.

The supposed constitutional argument against this bill, in my judgment, is in substance and effect merely the expression of a hope to bring about the nullification of the Constitution by failure to enforce it. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DENISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6810 and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On this bill?

Mr. FESS. No; but to print an address which I delivered on the United States as a world power.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On what subject?

Mr. RIDDICK. On a bill that I have introduced in regard to drought conditions in the Northwest.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no objection to that; we are going to have a severe drought here pretty soon. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, a bill to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Commitee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There are remaining eight hours of general debate, 240 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 253 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to put into the RECORD the result of some inquiries made at the Internal Revenue Office with regard to the financial effect of the prohibitory law. This is a matter of serious consequence to the taxpayers of the country, and is having the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means with respect to revenue production.

I find that for the 10 months up to and including April of the last fiscal year we collected from wines, distilled spirits, and other intoxicating beverages $408,274,000. The estimated receipts for May and June to complete the fiscal year brings the total up to $533,000,000. In addition to that sum the Treasury gained heavily from income and excess profits taxes arising from the liquor business. That was under the old laws. If prohibition were not in effect, we would under the new revenue law receive for the six months from June 30 to December 30, 1919, approximately $325,000,000. For the whole fiscal year, ending June 30 next, our receipts without prohibition would be $638,000,000. In addition we would receive income tax and excess-profits taxes sufficient to bring the grand total up to $1,000,000,000. This revenue, which is fully three times as much as we can possibly receive from the tariff, is now gone. All the revenue officials look forward to in lieu of this billion dollars is about $70,000,000 which may be collected on nonbeverage alcohol. This loss of revenue presents a problem which may ultimately call for the issue of additional bonds.

The soft drink and ice cream people, who are benefited by prohibition, are asking that their taxes be reduced, as are many other tradesmen who sought the destruction of the liquor business. What is now collected from them is insignificant when compared with what the Government loses in prohibition. In addition to the billion dollar loss, the revenue officials are put to increased expense, which must be drawn from taxes, to enforce the prohibitory laws.

It is fair, in view of the insistent demands for a reduction of taxes, that these pregnant facts with regard to the revenues should be made known.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it shall be my purpose during the time allotted me to speak to call attention to the provisions of the bill H. R. 6810, which I do not think have been discussed as yet with sufficient particularity. I have not been of those who deemed it the part of legislative wisdom to take from the State the police power it has always held under our constitutional form of government, because I believe that in the reservation of rights, both National and State, the police power and the enforcement of the police power belonged to the several States. But now we have come to the question of writing a code for the enforcement of constitutional prohibition. And I will consider, too, the question whether or not we should pass and in what way we should pass upon the question of an enforcement code for so-called wartime prohibition, and upon these questions I take it that it is my duty as a Representative in the Congress of the United States to do what I can to have enacted a code of proper enforcement of the law, because no matter what one's individual state of mind may have been regarding anything preceding this, we are now face to face with the necessity for enforcement statutes, and my own position is—and I am sure the position of every man in this House would be—that a code shall be passed which will carry into effect the legislative intent. And when I speak of the passage of a code I speak of one which will be for the benefit of the sane, the honest, the law abiding, the loyal citizens of the United States, not a code which will enable those who do not or will not assimilate American ideas to avoid the manifest intent of the law, nor yet a code which bespeaks only the wishes of those who are intolerant of personal liberty. Therefore I come to a discussion of the propositions in this bill, and it may be well for this committee to understand that there is only one title in the threefold bill as it is now before the committee of this House which came from the Committee on the Judiciary. It has been urged or it has been said in argument that the terms of this bill are drastic. They are in a sense drastic, but when the bill was introduced and came to the Committee on the Judiciary its terms were much more drastic; its terms, if I may use the phrase, were unreasonable, and after the common counsel of the committee, in the communion of minds of the Committee on the Judiciary, which has given careful attention to this bill, that which is now contained in the bill H. R. 6810 is presented for your consideration, and I wish the members of the committee would follow me in what I have to say regarding the bill, because I take it that sometimes those who are in favor of a measure of this kind will accept any terms and those who oppose a measure of this kind are opposed to it in any form.

This is an erroneous position to take, for, as I have tried to make known before, my own position, and I think the position of the members of this committee and of the House and of the Congress, is to write a code of enforcement that will carry into effect honestly, well, and fairly the legislative intent and the public mandate. Therefore I say when the bill was first introduced in the House it came with the inclusion of titles of war prohibition and of constitutional prohibition. It came not from the Committee on the Judiciary or anyone upon it, but it came from two sources altogether outside of any congressional or legislative function. The bill coming to the committee in this form, it was taken up and then was considered the question as to whether or not the war prohibition sections should be included with the general bill or whether they should be separate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman, a member of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not exactly understand the gentleman's statement. I am on the Judiciary Committee, and I have always understood that Mr. VOLSTEAD had drawn and introduced this bill. If anybody else did so, who was it?

Mr. GARD. The statement has been made and unchallenged that the bill was prepared in great part by those representing the Anti-Saloon League, and my information is that they were assisted by counsel for the Patent Medicine Association upon matters of interest to them.

Mr. THOMAS. Was there any such statement made before the Committee on the Judiciary as to that?

Mr. GARD. The statement was made on the floor of the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I mean before the committee?

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Who was it?

Mr. GARD. It appears substantially in the hearings. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state at this time, as I intend to discuss the bill, I will welcome any interruption at any time upon any question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I just wanted to suggest this to the gentleman, that if he will take the bill as it was introduced by me and compare it with the original draft that was introduced at the other end of this Capitol he will find there is a very material difference between the two.

Mr. GARD. That is what I say.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It was redrawn practically to a great extent by myself.

Mr. GARD. I am trying to get before the committee that this bill we are now considering in the Committee of the Whole, coming from the Committee on the Judiciary, is a less drastic bill than those heretofore introduced and less drastic than before its marked and frequent amendments in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARKLEY. Did the gentleman mean to intimate a moment ago——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will yield to the gentleman from California or the gentleman from Kentucky, either one.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Did I understand the gentleman to say the patent-medicine men had their hands in this bill in the way of its drawing?

Mr. GARD. Well, I do not know what the gentleman means by the phrase "hands in the bill," but there is no question but what the counsel for the patent-medicine men, in connection with the counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, cooperated and considered among themselves the terms of the bill and any amendment thereto before it was introduced, when it was before the committee, and afterwards.

Mr. RAKER. Then, is the bill, as it now appears before the House, as the patent-medicine men wanted it?

Mr. GARD. I do not know. I confess I do not speak for the patent-medicine men. I have no interest save the public good.

Mr. BAKER. I knew that. I was merely asking the question——

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire information.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from California sought an elucidation of the question that was in my mind, and his failure prompts me not to pursue the matter any further.

Mr. GARD. Very well. I am pleased to advise all gentlemen of anything I can, and I assure them that which I have said regarding the make-up of this bill and suggestions which came to the committee from time to time are true, and I attribute no wrongful or evil motive to any gentleman whom I have mentioned.

I merely speak of this as the genesis of the bill, so that we may understand what the original purport and intent was and that we may better now understand the bill.

Resuming, gentlemen of the committee, I take the position that the questions of war-time prohibition and of constitutional prohibition are so entirely different that there should have been afforded here a separation into specific and definite bills of the questions of war-time prohibition and of constitutional prohibition. There may be men here, and I am sure I know of men here, who have spoken to me, who are in favor of supporting an enforcement code for constitutional prohibition, but who at this time do not honestly believe that there is a necessity longer existing for the so-called war-time prohibition, and who would welcome a chance to give expression to their own opinions regarding whether it should be continued or whether it should at this time be repealed.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I ask the gentleman if he made the statement that the patent-medicine attorneys helped draw this bill?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; I did not make the statement that the patent-medicine attorneys helped draw this bill. I said they cooperated and conferred with the counsel of the Anti-Saloon League about matters which were to their interest in the bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me tell the gentleman that I have been in conference for the last two or three hours trying to agree on something acceptable to me and acceptable to them that I would like to submit to the committee. I am trying to reach an agreement with them. That does not mean that they are drawing the bill at all.

Mr. GARD. I did not understand whom the gentleman was in conference with.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. With men who are interested in and have attorneys here for the purpose of protecting, as they claim, the extract business and the sirup business. They appeared before the committee.

Mr. GARD. Understand that I have no objection to the gentleman conferring with anybody. It would seem to me, however, and I say it most respectfully, when it comes to a question of amending the bill the conferences of the chairman of the committee should be with his fellow members on the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will submit to the gentleman what we have agreed on, if we can agree, so that the committee may authorize me or some one else to offer those amendments, if there is any difficulty about it.

Mr. GARD. I should be very glad to have made known the results of the gentleman's conference.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I gave notice once before that I would do that.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. DYER rose.

Mr. GARD. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he did not vote in the committee to report this bill, practically, to the House?

Mr. GARD. There is no question of how I voted. The gentleman was there. I voted to report the bill to the House for consideration, reserving the right to object to any of the details or sections that I do not believe in.

Mr. THOMAS. Anybody has the right to object. The gentleman helped report the bill.

Mr. GARD. I do not yield further, Mr. Chairman. The position I occupy, therefore, first, is that there should have been a separation of war-time prohibition from constitutional prohibition in separate bills. Secondly, I take the position that war-time prohibition, by whatever means expressed, in a separate bill, or whether in title 1 of this bill, is now absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, will he pursue his argument without interruption for some time?

Mr. GARD. I made the statement that I would yield, because I wanted to afford everybody every bit of information I have about this bill and wanted to discuss the bill thoroughly.

The question of war-time prohibition, as we all know, came into being by the President's signing an agricultural appropriation bill after the armistice was signed, which declared a cessation of war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany. So that we start with the very unique proposition that war-time prohibition was never authorized by completed legislation until after the armistice was signed. Then we follow up the question of war-time prohibition, which had for its admitted and its only end the conservation of food and of fuel and of clothing, for one purpose and one purpose only, and that was the supremacy of the armies of the United States and the armies of the Allies. As time went on, conditions changed and have continuously been changing. Shortly after the armistice was signed the President by proclamation announced that there was no necessity for the maintenance of many of the war utilities; that there was no necessity for the maintenance of food regulations, and they were dispensed with. The President, as the Commander in Chief of our Army and our Navy, announced later that there was no reason why nonintoxicating beverages should not be made from cereals, which, of course, might be used for human and animal food. The President then had the courage to say, on the 20th of May last, in his message to Congress:

> The demobilization of the military forces has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and of beers.

And yesterday the President of the United States, in his message to the Senate, said:

> The war ended in November, eight months ago.

Now we are met with the remarkable statement in the majority opinion, coming from the Committee on the Judiciary—

> That war exists with both Germany and Austria needs no argument.

The statement continues:

> It can not be said with any assurance that hostilities may not be resumed at any time, and in view of the unsettled conditions, it is difficult to guess not only when the war will end but still more difficult to determine when demobilization will be complete.

It further says:

> In this condition it would seem that there is a fair chance war prohibition may last until constitutional prohibition takes effect in January of next year, which is only a little more than six months off. From the standpoint of those who believe in prohibition this is desirable and will no doubt meet the wishes of the vast majority of our people.

Now, as opposed to that, we have the declaration of the President of the United States, not alone in his message of May 20 to the Congress, but in his message to the Senate yesterday, bringing to them the treaty of peace and disclosing the magnificent achievements of American men in arms on foreign fields. The wonderful assistance of our free men fighting on sea and on foreign soil for the preservation of liberty and civilization here and throughout the world is, thank God, no longer necessary.

We have the statement that the war ended in November, eight months ago, and there is no question, as a matter of fact, but that the war is ended, and that the Imperial German Government is impotent to resume the conflict. So that when we come to the question of war prohibition, as we do face it now, it is only a pretense for the continuation of prohibition which was started under the guise of attempting to conserve the food and the fuel of the Nation for the benefit of our armies and the armies of our Allies.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TINCHER. What was the idea of Congress in putting into the war-time prohibition legislation the statement concerning the demobilization of the Army?

Mr. GARD. That is a statement that was inserted in the law as passed by the Congress.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman think the Army is demobilized?

Mr. GARD. I have no means of knowing. That is a question between the Chief of Staff and the Attorney General and the President of the United States.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman think that a man who has a son who volunteered in the Army and can not be released to come back home and work has any reason to believe that the Army is demobilized?

Mr. GARD. Oh, I am trying to discuss this bill. I am trying to make an intelligent discussion of this enforcement bill. I do not desire to refer to outside matters which have nothing to do with the case.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Can not the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the forces, declare that the demobilization is now completed?

Mr. GARD. The President of the United States has taken a very honest position. He could suspend this by the declaration that the demobilization is complete. He has taken the stand that by the present legislation he can not honestly say—and the people of the country do not want him to say that which is dishonest—that the demobilization is now complete.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did he not say, however, that he expected to be able to make that declaration early in September?

Mr. GARD. I do not know as to the time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think he said on the 20th of September.

Mr. GARD. He has stated that at the earliest possible time, when he could honestly say so, he would declare that the demobilization had been completed, so as to rid the country of this pretense of war-time prohibition.

Now, I think the people of the country are not disposed to look with favor upon war measures in times of peace. I refer no more to war-time prohibition than I do to war measures affecting the property and the rights and liberties of the people, because I am one of those who believe that when the war is ended and when the necessity for war measures has ceased those measures should be repealed, and America and Americans should proceed under proper laws on a peace basis. [Applause.]

However, when we come to the question of the enforcement of the so-called war-time prohibition bill, then I say to this committee that title 1 of this bill was written in the early winter of this year by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary and is the only part of this bill which came originally from the Committee on the Judiciary. The industrial alcohol part, known as title 3, came from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Title 2 came from the combined sources, of which I before advised the House. So that if we do decide that war prohibition is necessary at this time—which I most earnestly contend is not tenable—still, if we do decide that it is necessary, sweeping aside all that we know to be actual facts, sweeping aside the great and glorious fact that the war is ended, and living only up to the hypocritical pretense that somehow, anyhow, we want to make this prohibition continue until constitutional prohibition can come in, then we should write a code, and I say very frankly that if we come to the writing of a code for war-time prohibition, then that which has been prepared by this Committee on the Judiciary in title 1 is, in my opinion, a fair and reasonable code for the enforcement of war-time prohibition during the time it shall endure, with the exception of the provision relative to the declaration of liquors in fact nonintoxicating to be intoxicating.

And upon that I make the point, as a member of this Committee on the Judiciary, that no matter what the power may be in the Constitution of the United States by virtue of the ratification of the eighteenth amendment, there is no power in the Congress of the United States under this rider upon an Agricultural appropriation bill to declare something to be intoxicating which is not intoxicating. In other words, I dispute the power of this Congress under a war power, which war power assuredly is now ended, but conceding that it is continued under a war power, to write something into a law which the bill did not contemplate and which no one had in mind. The reservation in the war-time prohibition bill was for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and it permitted their export.

Different views may be entertained about the constitutional provision, but no matter how we view the question of the right or power of the Congress to extend constitutional prohibition, there can be no proper contention that in this limited power which we ourselves wrote we can now, when there is no war, extend the war-time prohibition to a liquor absolutely nonintoxicating and declare it to be intoxicating. We might say, instead of one-half of 1 per cent, one-twentieth of 1 per cent, or any of the most impossible of figures, and I am not juggling in percentages—to adopt language heretofore used in debate. We are writing this bill reasonably. The chairman of the committee said that he knew a man who drank kerosene, and that he knew a man who drank a hundred glasses of beer a day, or something of that kind.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I made no such statement.

Mr. GARD. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I so understood the gentleman to say. I read the RECORD. But, at any rate, we are not making a bill for such people, because we can not take into consideration the pervert or the man whose mental and physical idiosyncrasies impel him to do these very extraordinary things. We are writing a bill supposedly for reasonable men in a free country, and that is the kind of a code that I want to be a party to the making of.

Now, coming to the question, therefore, of constitutional prohibition, I desire to call attention——

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KREIDER. Just on a matter of information.

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KREIDER. In your judgment as a lawyer, what would happen if this law provided that the President should declare that demobilization had been completed on the 1st of September and should declare this whole proposition off? Is this law that we are now considering of such a character that it would be in force and effect——

Mr. GARD. If the President, having legal authority, announces that the demobilization is complete and the war concluded, this law, of course, is at an end.

Mr. KREIDER. Another question. In the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio, has the President now the power, in view of the fact that this legislation was enacted for the express purpose of saving food and food products and fuel, to declare that the emergency is passed and call off the ban on light wines?

Mr. GARD. No; the President has no such power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. GARD. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that while such power does not exist in the President at this time, in my opinion it should.

In the five additional minutes granted to me I desire to call attention to certain matters. I do not know that I can go over them as well as I should like to——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I think the House is much interested in hearing the gentleman in extenso, and I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes without regard to the time that has been limited.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MADDEN). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that, independent of the time fixed in the House for general debate, the gentleman from Ohio have 30 minutes additional time. Is there objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GARD. I would like some little time to proceed. Will the gentleman from Illinois inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota if he will yield to me, say, 10 minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not, because I have not got the time.

Mr. GARD. Very well.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] has agreed to yield 10 minutes to me, and I will ask him to yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio instead. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio 10 minutes in addition to the 5 minutes already yielded.

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes in addition to the five minutes accorded a few moments ago?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes. While I desire to be entirely courteous, and I appreciate the extension of time which has been given me, I would like to go over the paragraphs of the bill for the information of the committee.

Mr. DYER. I appeal to the committee that the gentleman from Ohio may be allowed to proceed to discuss the bill without interruption.

Mr. GARD. I want to yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was very much interested in the answer that the gentleman from Ohio gave to the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER]. Is the gentleman from Ohio clearly of the opinion that in the event that the President of the United States should declare demobilization, as a matter of fact, concluded, that would then, eo instanti, nullify all of the provisions of the war-time prohibition enforcement part of this bill?

Mr. GARD. I think so, when the two things are complete, the conclusion of the war and the demobilization of the troops, these to be evidenced by presidential proclamation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Ohio off his feet with a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not trying to take him off his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. GARD. I desire to be courteous to my committee colleague in the matter, but I do not yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to have the gentleman's time extended 10 minutes.

Mr. GARD. In the discussion of constitutional prohibition provisions I start with this premise, that by an amendment to the Constitution submitted by Congress and ratified by the legislatures of the States we have been given the power to pass an enforcement code, and not alone the power but the duty. We should observe that. The enforcement code, as given to us by our own act and ratified by the States, calls, in my opinion, for that which it expressly says, and that is for the passage of laws to carry into effect the language of the amendment, that being to prohibit "the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and exportation of intoxicating liquors." Now, in this law we go further than that. We make two classes. We have alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine. Those are assembled in one class. Those are prohibited absolutely in themselves. Then there is another class—

And in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume which are potable or capable of being used as a beverage.

Now, this percentage of alcohol is not contemplated in the prohibition amendment either as passed by this Congress or as ratified by the States. It can only be defended as proper in a legal sense by the statement that the police power of the States does permit such a thing to be done; and it was done in Oregon, Ohio, and elsewhere, where certain legislatures have gone to great extremes, and the Supreme Court has upheld their action upon the idea that the police power of the States permitted it to be done.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I decline to yield. I am sorry I can not. The power of State legislatures to do this has been upheld by the Supreme Court, upon the idea that the police power of the States permitted it to be done, but the United States as a Federal Government has no police power, and it can only be asserted that that which may go along as a reasonable carrying out of the idea of the prohibition amendment may be included and put into words.

To use another illustration, certain States have held, and the Supreme Court of the United Staes has upheld it—I use whisky as an illustration only—that for the purpose of stopping the sale of whisky anything which the legislative body may say resembles whisky, looks like whisky, or is near whisky, may be included in the prohibition. I myself do not believe that this power exists under this constitutional amendment, and I say that this alcoholic content is such as to include liquids not in contemplation of prohibition at the time of the passage of the act or its ratification, and that title 3 of this bill absolutely destroys many industries, many manufacturing concerns which are essential for the public good. I refer to paragraphs "e" and "f" on page 10 of the bill in section 4, concerning which I make the statement that flavoring extracts which are used in the daily household economy—I say if this is continued the flavoring extract people throughout the United States will have to close their doors.

The chairman of the committee said there was an Indian in Minnesota who got a nauseated stomach from drinking lemon extract. We can not make the bill applying to all people of the United States, because of some pervert——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I decline to yield. If the gentleman will give me 10 minutes, I will yield the 10 minutes to him for questions, and will undertake to give satisfactory answer to all.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You are mistaken.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair that both gentleman are violating the rules of the House by referring to each other in the second person.

Mr. GARD. I am not, because I declined to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARD. I want to be more than courteous to the gentleman, but I really can not yield any further.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to ask for an extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GARD. Under the rule of this committee I have no right to it. So the chairman of the committee is now engaged in the proposition to enlarge the scope, or liberalize this provision, relating to flavoring extracts. I speak of this because it is one of the things that should be amended.

Now, returning to section 3, where I speak of the language on page 9 relative to the manufacture, sale, barter, giving away, transporting, and so forth, furnishing, receiving, possession of intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act, and I tell the committee that when we considered this section we had the word "use" after the word "possess." The word "use" has been stricken out, and the word "possess" should be stricken out. The words "give away" should be stricken out. The words "furnish" and "receive," in my opinion, should be stricken out unless this committee and this House intend to write a bill so drastic as to make it appear in the eyes of the people of the United States that there is nothing in it except a bill of absolute prohibition. I do not care how much it may be safeguarded, I do not want any sale under the guise of "giving away," but these words have never been enacted by the Federal Congress anywhere in a measure of this kind. We are going far afield when we invade the privilege or the liberty of the habits or the hospitality of a man's home, and I do not think that Congress wants to go that far.

At the conclusion of section 3 there is a provision for wine for sacramental purposes, that it may be purchased, sold, transported, and used as herein provided. But in the "herein provided" there is absolutely nothing as to the use of sacramental wines. You can buy them on a permit, but you can not use them so far as this bill is concerned for sacramental purposes.

Referring to section 4 again in paragraph "f" about vinegar, I will state that originally it said "vinegar manufactured from cider." We know that 95 per cent of the vinegar, the common table product, is recognized as having been made from alcohol, and nobody has any objection to that except one man who appeared as a witness, who said he thought that some dangerously insidious drink might be made from vinegar.

These things I offer to show the general trend of those who advocate the extreme in radicalism regarding this bill and similar bills.

There is no provision about the exemption of cider and the innocuous or harmless drinks that may be manufactured at home, which everybody knows under this bill are absolutely prohibited if it can be found by a Government chemist that they contain one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. Beverages absolutely disassociated, impossible to associate with intoxicating liquors, drinks which the honest people do not want to dispense with are by this act made an absolute crime. So that one who manufactures a harmless, innocuous, home-made drink out of cider or grape juice or elderberries or dandelions, or anything like that, is haled before the law as a violator of the eighteenth constitutional amendment. Such a thing, gentlemen, was never in either the legislative or the public mind. [Applause.]

I refer now—and I must go over them rapidly—to section 9 as it appears on page 15, which provides that if a physician is guilty of some technical violation of the law in a matter of issuing a permit he can be compelled to appear before a commissioner or his agent—and you take him not where the offense was committed, but you run him all over the country and have a hearing at some place within 50 miles.

I concede that section 20 has a good purpose, but it is not carried out properly. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to drink liquor on a train or automobile or both. The intention is to prohibit public drinking, and that is all right; but it goes so far as to prohibit anybody who may be ill on a boat or a car and who may have liquor prescribed by a physician. If he does drink it, even under such conditions, he is amenable to the law, and is subject to the pains and penalties of the law. I think it should be amended in that particular. In bringing these things out I want to assure the committee that I am not technical. I want to call attention to those things that are in the bill so that we, this committee, not somebody on the outside, but this House of Representative may write a sane and proper and reasonable enforcement bill and see that it is enforced.

Section 25 of the bill provides a punishment for contempt, for the violation of an injunction as provided in the terms of the law. It provides a fine of not more than $1,000 and that the accused may be imprisoned for not less than 30 days nor more than one year. This notwithstanding the fact that we passed a law in 1913 which was heralded through the world that the provisions of the contempt section should be liberalized and that no arbitrary court should have the right to declare a man guilty of contempt and give him the right of trial by jury. Nevertheless, it is proposed to enact in this law a provision of the kind referred to where the general statutes passed in the Sixty-third Congress, section 2, at page 739, provide that the accuser may demand a jury trial under the provisions of the antitrust law. Under the provisions of that act, for the benefit of those who may be unjustly accused, a trial by jury exists, but in this section of this proposed law it does not.

In section 24, page 24, the language of the bill is insufficient to carry out its intent, the words "such fact" to be added after the word "trial," in line 1, on page 24, being necessary to properly complete such meaning.

This bill as originally introduced had a very drastic and comprehensive provision as to search warrants, allowing them to be procured upon the affidavits of "two credible persons before any magistrate," but it has been very sensibly modified so as to carry out in this law the provisions provided in Title II of public law No. 24, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved June 15, 1917.

Some additional language may be necessary to clarify the meaning of section 26, which provides that no search warrant shall issue to search any private dwelling occupied as such unless it is in part used for some business purpose, such as a store, shop, saloon, restaurant, hotel, or boarding house, so that the workingman or shopkeeper who is forced by circumstances to live in rooms which may be construed to be a part of a store or shop may not be subjected to unlawful search warrants.

In section 31, on page 28, there appears the remarkable provision that after one may be convicted of the violation of any of the provisions of this act, in addition to the penalty imposed after such conviction, the court may require the defendant to execute a bond, with security approved by the court, in a sum not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, conditioned that he will not violate any of the provisions of this act for the term of one year.

If the person convicted and serving a penalty under the conviction finds it financially impossible to give such bond he is then committed to jail and confined for a period not longer than six months.

This is certainly imprisoning a man for six months because he is unable to give a bond in addition to the fine or fine and imprisonment prescribed by this act.

Section 32, on page 29, undertakes to compel a man to testify or produce books and papers of his own, even though they may tend to incriminate him, but provides that no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing to which he may so testify or produce evidence.

Section 34, on page 29, undertakes to authorize legal pleading to include separate offenses and separate acts in affidavit, information, or indictment and the trial of a defendant on all at one trial and the penalty for all offenses be imposed. It attempts to provide that it is not necessary to advise the defendant in the affidavit, information, or indictment of the name of the purchaser or to include any defensive negative averments, "but it shall be sufficient to state that the act complained of was then and there prohibited and unlawful."

In section 35, on page 30, it is provided that—

> Ten days after the date when this act becomes operative the possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, given away, furnished, or otherwise disposed of, in violation of the provisions of this title. Every person legally permitted under this title to have liquor shall report to the commissioner within 10 days after the passage of this act the kind and amount of intoxicating liquors in his possession.

The section provides:

> But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him only as a dwelling, and such liquor need not be reported: Provided, That the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor that the liquor was lawfully acquired and possessed.

It would seem that the proviso in line 18 of section 35 would make it incumbent upon the possessor of liquors in one's private dwelling to prove that the liquor was lawfully acquired and possessed.

Section 37, page 32, formerly contained provisions authorizing the compromise of any civil or criminal causes, but has been most sensibly modified so as to provide only for the compromise of civil causes, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Attorney General.

There may be some other sections of this bill to which I will call attention in the debate under the five-minute rule, but I can not longer continue now, since I am advised that my time has expired.

I am very grateful to the members of the committee for having heard me thus at length. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. GARD was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the members of this committee, after having listened to the very lucid explanation by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], are convinced that this is a highly penal statute. All penal statutes have in contemplation three things—first, the punishment of the individual who violates them; second, the deterring of others who perhaps might violate them from such violation; and, third, reformation by punishment of those who have actually violated them. Having those three things in mind as being the objects of penal statutes, the next thing for consideration is this: What shall be the method of the enforcement of a penal statute? There are three methods of enforcement. One method of enforcement may be so loose that it is entirely inadequate and does not meet the purposes for which it was intended, and, therefore, the statute becomes nugatory. The second method may be one that is so drastic that everyone in the community is up in arms against its provisions, and it becomes so unpopular that it is not capable of enforcement by reason of its drastic provisions. The third method is by what one would call a reasonable enforcement, there being such provisions in the statute that the common sense of the people and the justice of the people recognize that it is a fair, legitimate, and reasonable method by which to obtain the desired results. Therefore in the approach of this question we should ask ourselves: Are we now preparing to enact a law which is a reasonable enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution?

I am willing to take up the argument of some of the gentlemen who have proposed it from the Republican side of the aisle, and particularly the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. I do not wish to misquote him at all, and therefore I take the words from his report. He says:

> The right to define the power conferred upon it by the Constitution has been exercised by Congress ever since we had a Government. Every act that it passes is, in effect, an assertion that the Constitution confers power to pass it and is a construction of its terms.

The other day, whilst the gentleman was proceeding before this committee, I asked him explicitly whether he deemed this provision in the enforcement, to wit, the stipulation that the alcoholic content should not be greater than one-half of 1 per cent, a construction of the Constitution, and he said he thought that it was. I grant you that he may be correct in his premise, but to what conclusion do we come?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have only 15 minutes, and I desire to pursue the argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DEWALT. To what conclusion must we inevitably come, if the gentleman is correct in his premise? If the Legislature, being the Congress of the United States, has the right at this moment, by this enforcement provision in this bill, to say that one-half of 1 per cent shall be the alcoholic constituent in intoxicating drinks, then it has the same right 15 minutes from this time to declare than 1 per cent shall be the constituent; and if it has the right to say that, it has the right to say that it shall be 5 per cent, and the next Congress has the right to say that it shall be 10 per cent, and in every succeeding Congress you have a different construction of the Constitution of the United States. In other words, you come to another conclusion, that you have this liquor question presented at every term of Congress by a different congressional body, and you will never get rid of it as long as the theory of the gentleman obtains.

Let us proceed with this idea of concurrence as set forth by Mr. Wheeler. Mr. Wheeler, before the committee, said that "concurrent power" means equal power. I shall take him at his word. I do not believe it, but I shall take him at his word. Then, what must inevitably follow? If the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States have concurrent power to pass appropriate laws to enforce this provision—and that is the language of the constitutional amendment—then it follows inevitably that if they have an equal power they have both the right to pass similar laws. That is clearly so. If they have equal rights, they have also the right to pass dissimilar laws, because equality gives both of them the same power and precisely the same function. Therefore it follows inevitably as a matter of pure reasoning that if the Congress says in this enforcement provision that the constituent amount of alcohol shall be one-half of 1 per cent, and the Legislature of Pennsylvania says it shall be 1 per cent, they are both within their rights. Then what have you? Then you have a Federal statute declaring it shall be one-half of 1 per cent and a State statute declaring it shall be 1 per cent. How do you punish? The gentlemen on the other side say that we punish by the Federal authority, that it then becomes supreme; but that will not hold, and why? Because if one be supreme, then they can not be equal.

Where there is supremacy there can not be equality. Therefore these gentlemen are reduced to what you would call the reductio ad absurdum. Their argument leads them into the pitfall of absurdity instead of that which is tenable under the law and under the propositions which they themselves make. Then what must follow? Then there must follow, inevitably, that you must take the word "concurrent" as meaning what it usually does mean. Now, what does it mean?

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman give the book and page?

Mr. DEWALT. I will, sir. It is reported in 38 N. W., 529; in 62 Wisconsin, and also In re Mattson (United States), 69 Fed., page 535, and so forth.

The words "concurrent jurisdiction" must have been used in the compact between the Federal Government, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, in the sense in which they had previously been used and were generally understood. When, therefore, by such compact, it was in effect provided that each State shall have "concurrent jurisdiction" on that portion of the River St. Croix constituting the boundary line between them, it included the exercise of such legislative powers by each State over the whole river as were consistent with the exercise of similar powers over the same portion of the river by the other States. In other words, by such compact each State secured to itself such concurrent jurisdiction upon the half of the river within the territorial limits of the other State by reducing what otherwise would have been its exclusive jurisdiction upon its own half to mere concurrent jurisdiction. The result is that neither of these States could, as against the other, rightfully assume, or authorize the assumption of, permanent and exclusive occupancy, possession, and control of the entire navigable portion of the river. (J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. St. Croix Boom Corp., 38 N. W., 529, 542; 72 Wis., 62; 7 Am., St. Rep., 837.)

The definition of "concurrent jurisdiction" given in Keaton L. Co. v. Boom Corp., supra, quoted and approved, and it was held that, as used in relation to the concurrent jurisdiction over the Columbia River by the States of Washington and Oregon, it means "acting in conjunction," and, when applied to the jurisdiction of Oregon to enact penal laws for the Columbia River, it can only mean the power to enact such criminal statutes as are agreed to or acquiesced in by the State of Washington, or as are already in force within its jurisdiction. (In re Mattson (U. S.), 69 Fed., 535–540.)

Therefore if the theory of the gentleman from Minnesota, the head of this distinguished committee, is not tenable, to wit, that each of the States and the Federal Government can construe the Constitution in its own way at different times and in different ways, and if the theory of Mr. Wheeler in regard to the equality of power between the States and the Federal Government is also not tenable, then we inevitably are forced to the conclusion that the only tenable theory to take here is to take the exact words of the constitutional provision. And what are they?

That the several States shall have concurrent power, with the Federal Government to pass appropriate legislation for the enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution.

Now, so much for the legal phase of this question. I very much desire to elaborate——

Mr. DENISON rose.

Mr. DEWALT. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I can not yield. I very much desire to discuss this question, which is a very interesting one, I am free to admit, but I have not the time. I believe I have been styled by one gentleman from Ohio as nothing but a technical lawyer, and he quotes as his authority Edmund Burke by saying that Edmund Burke has declared that a technical lawyer was not a good one. I am perfectly willing to admit it, as I am willing to admit the eminent authority coming from the college which the gentleman from Ohio represents, but be that as it may, I am quite willing to admit also that, with my limited knowledge and perhaps with my limited study upon this subject, everyone must confess that this is a very serious question, and more than that, it is not a question without some doubt; I grant that the decisions cited in the majority report in regard to State legislation and in regard to the prevention of sale of nonintoxicants have some weight, but my friends seem to lose sight of the great distinction. These statutes, all of them, are in regard to State laws. The Poinsetta case, which was referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE], is clearly and explicitly a statute in regard to the enforcement solely of a State law. In other words, it is an enforcement of a police regulation of a sovereign State, but this is a different proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, upon the careful perusal of this bill and analysis of the same, the severity and extraordinary powers conferred become very apparent, and it is surprising that any lawyer as eminent as the one holding the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee of the House should seriously attempt the passage of any such measure.

ENORMOUS EXPENSE ENTAILED.

Section 2 of the proposed act authorizes the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to appoint any assistants or agents that he may deem necessary, and that he, or any of his assistants or agents, can perform any of the acts enumerated in the bill. Considering the vast territory of the United States and the number of people resident therein, it is needless to say that this would at once create an army of commissioners and agents, whose pay roll would exceed anything now contemplated in any of the departments of the Government. These agents are authorized to prosecute any case and make complaints of violations of the law before any magistrate or justice of the peace, thus harassing all people, and multiplying fees for themselves in such prosecutions.

Section 3 of the act prohibits not only the manufacturing, selling, and bartering of any intoxicating liquor, but also prohibits the giving of the same, the words used being "give away" any intoxicating liquor. In other words, as the act also says that it would be literally construed, all men would be prohibited in giving away a glass of wine to any of his guests at his own table.

Section 4 describes medical preparations that may be manufactured as nonpotable—that is, incapable of being drank—and patented and proprietary medicines must also be nonpotable; antiseptics and toilet articles must be nonpotable; in other words, incapable of being drank. In the same section of the act, any person who manufactures any of the articles mentioned in that section, namely, medical preparations or proprietary medicines or toilet articles, must first secure a permit to manufacture the articles and to purchase the alcoholic liquor needed, and he must give bond, keep records, and make reports as directed by the commissioner. The amount of bond seems to be at the pleasure of the commissioner, thus making it actually prohibitive if the commissioner desires so to enforce the act.

COMMISSIONER AN AUTOCRAT.

Sections 5 and 6 empower the commissioner, when he is informed or "has a reason to believe" that an alcohol preparation, whether patented, proprietary, or not, is capable of being used as a beverage, to demand an analysis of the same, and if, at his discretion, he determines that such can be used as a beverage, he can deal with the same as an intoxicating beverage. No limit is placed at all as to the alcoholic ingredients, and then, to make matters worse, if the manufacturer of the preparation fails to show "to the satisfaction of the commissioner" that the preparation is not capable of being used for beverage purposes, it shall be treated as intoxicating liquor. Of course, the right of appeal is given, or right of review is given to the manufacturer in a court of equity; in other words, the commissioner finds him guilty, thus putting the burden on the defendant to prove his innocence; and then, if the commissioner is not satisfied, the defendant is obliged to go in a court of equity and again prove his innocence. The oppression and delay caused by any such proof is manifested without further argument.

Section 7 is one of the provisions speaking of the physicians, manufacturers, or wholesale druggists. Such permit shall specifically designate and limit the acts that are permitted and the time and place where such acts may be performed, thus leaving it at the discretion and determination of the commissioner to determine just what action he deems permissible under the provisions of the statutes or extraordinary power thus granted, and the autocratic authority thus given is beyond question. In the same section it is proposed that before a permit is granted by the commissioner he shall require a bond in such form as he may prescribe to insure compliance with the terms of the permit. No amount of bond is named, and the terms are entirely within the power of the commissioner.

RESTRICTIONS ON PHYSICIANS.

Section 7, also section 8, undertakes and actually does say that every physician who attempts to use any alcoholic liquor by prescription must be actually engaged in practice. In other words, a retired physician could not prescribe anything, however learned he might be, or however honest he might be, and in extreme cases the patient might die before he could get an acting physician to attend to his wants, and then the physician engaged in active practice, who is permitted to prescribe, must keep a record, alphabetically arranged, in a separate book provided by the commissioner, in which he must show the date and amount prescribed and to whom the same is issued and the directions for use, stating the amount and frequency of doses and the druggist to whom the prescription is addressed. When you consider the fact that some physicians in active practice make 100 or more calls a day and have their office work to attend to, the folly of such a provision is quite apparent. No physician could attend to any detail work unless he employed a clerical force for that particular purpose.

Section 9 is so extraordinary that it provides that if anyone makes complaint and files the same with the commissioner, setting forth that any person who has a permit is not in good faith conforming with the provisions of this act, or is guilty of violating the laws of any State relating to the sale of intoxicating liquor, the commissioner or his agent will immediately issue an order citing such person to appear before him on a day not more than 30 days or less than 15 days from the serving of the citation, and then a hearing shall take place within 50 miles of the place where it is charged the offense took place. In other words, the venue of the alleged offense is anywhere within 50 miles, and the complaint made by anyone simply requires an oath that the party is not acting in good faith.

WILL NEED ARMY OF PAINTERS.

Section 17 contemplates the employment by the commissioner of artists and painters, who are authorized to remove or paint over, or, in other words, obliterate any advertisements from any signs, billboads, or other places that have reference to the sale of liquor. They shall be thus engaged upon the demand of any citizen who has requested the person in charge or the owner of the property to remove the same. When we consider the fact that the painters are now receiving 80 cents an hour in some localities, and consider the number of billboards or advertising schemes that there are and the number of advertisements that are now in existence and that have been placed there a long time prior to the enactment of this proposed legislation, it seems quite easy to determine that the department of the commissioner will have to employ all the painters in the neighborhood to obliterate the signs and advertisements now existing, upon the request of any party who makes the complaint.

Section 20 states that any proprietor of any hotel or house of public entertainment shall not permit any bell boy, elevator boy, or other employee to procure any intoxicating liquors for or give any information by which intoxicating liquors can be secured by any guest, patron, or other person. In other words, the proprietor of the hotel or the proprietor of public or private entertainment is made responsible for the acts of bell boys or elevator boys, whether those acts are with or without his knowledge. He is made a party to the alleged crime merely because he happens to have in his employ a bell boy or elevator boy or any other employee who informs anybody where a drink can be obtained.

Section 21 forbids the advertisement by pictures of a brewery, distillery, bottle, keg, barrel, or box in any newspaper unless such newspaper prints upon such advertisement the words "Printed as paid advertising."

TRAVELERS AT LAW'S MERCY.

Section 20 forbids anyone in a railroad coach or automobile or dining car, or on the platform of such car, to take a drink, whatever the extreme necessity for the same may be. A man having a glass of brandy, who is suddenly taken with cramps, could not take this drink lawfully, and if he did take it the conductor or person in charge of the car or the train would have authority, without warrant, to arrest the person and to turn such person over to the proper official. It may be that some statutes in the remote past, during the Spanish inquisition, provided for such powers, but they have never been heard of in civilization in recent years.

Sections 22 and 23 provide that any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is sold, kept, bartered, or manufactured in violation of this act should be declared a common nuisance, and any person who assists in maintaining such a common nuisance is guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than a year. It further provides that if it should be proved that the owner of the building has, without any knowledge, negligently suffered the same to be used or occupied for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor contrary to the provisions of the act such premises should be subject to a lien for, and may be sold to pay all fines or costs assessed against the occupant of the building. In other words, if the owner of a property, even without his knowledge, or with slight negligence, the degree of which is not determined except by court and jury, should have a tenant in the premises who in any way violated the provisions of the act and such person is fined, the owner of the premises is subject to a lien for all such penalty against the tenant and is obliged to pay the costs and fine or have his property sold.

Section 25 provides that any person who carries around on his person any liquor to effect the sale of it shall be declared a common nuisance and be restrained by injunction, and it is not necessary in such injunction proceeding to prove that there was an intention of violating the act. No bond is required of the complainant, as is usual in the application for injunction proceedings to protect the interests of the alleged offender, and it is further provided that upon proof of the material allegations of the petition, and upon judgment of the court, the court can order the premises closed for one year or until the owner of the premises gives bond in the sum of not less than $500 or more than $1,000, under condition that no intoxicating liquor will be kept upon the premises by anyone, and that he will pay the costs and damages that may be assessed.

Section 27 is a remuneration provision, remunerative to the offices created by the provisions of the act, because it states that the officer shall be entitled to charge and receive the same fees as the sheriff of the county for levying upon and selling property on execution, and keep them closed during the period of a year or more; a very delightful avenue for multiplication of fees and further remuneration to the commissioner and his numberless corps of assistants.

Section 26 provides that any person violating any of the terms of the injunction as provided for in this act shall be punished for contempt by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, and by imprisonment of not less than 30 days nor more than 12 months.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE PROVISION.

Section 26 provides for the issuance of search warrants as provided by law. It provides further for the seizure of all liquors and the disposition of the same. The warrant is to be issued and sworn to by two credible persons. It is to be presumed from the general tenor of the act that the testimony of these persons is entirely in the province of the commissioner or one of his numerous assistants or deputies, an avenue open to graft. It needs no further comment.

Section 34 does not state the ordinary punishment now provided by all the States for the violation of the liquor laws, but it further provides that for the second offense a person shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one year and not more than five years, and this punishment applies to retail druggists and pharmacists. No doubt this was intended for a great inducement for druggists or pharmacists to continue their occupation.

INTOXICANTS IN THE HOME.

Section 39 is so liberal in its provisions that it actually allows liquor in private dwellings while the same is occupied as a private dwelling, with this proviso, that all such liquor must be placed in the private dwelling prior to the date when the act went into effect, but the burden of showing that the liquor was placed in the dwelling prior to that date is upon the person accused of possessing the liquor. In other words, it is a charge that a man has liquor in his house, which makes him a criminal who must prove his innocence. The usual and legal way of proceeding is to cast the burden of proof upon the Commonwealth.

These are some of the glaring and drastic provisions of this so-called constitutional enforcement. Are free people willing to submit to them without violent protest?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have only 10 minutes, and I ask that I be not interrupted during that time.

The late Joseph Cook said that the day would come in America when the two strongest passions of the human heart, the love of country and the love of home, would entwine themselves about the neck of the liquor traffic and strangle it forever. That hour has come. [Applause.]

The people of this Nation, after a fair trial of the liquor traffic by a jury of the American people, have convicted it of the most infamous crimes and have said by that verdict that this great criminal of the ages must die. [Applause.]

Forty-five of the forty-eight States of the Union have condemned this criminal to certain death, and we, the representatives of the people, are now called upon simply to prepare means and methods that will effectively execute and enforce the verdict of the people.

And in carrying out the will of the people in the execution of the sentence of death upon this monster criminal we must be faithful to our duty. We are to swing this criminal from a gallows erected by the millions he has wronged, by the survivors of the victims he has murdered. The rope must be strong and sufficient; the knot must be properly adjusted so as to break the neck of the liquor traffic. We must answer to the people who will hold us responsible for a faithful and strict execution of this verdict of death.

As a lawyer in active practice for 34 years I have noted that when a wealthy criminal who has committed some great crime is put on trial he can demand the best counsel, rich friends, and political assistance, and the benefit of all the technicalities and loopholes that the law and money can provide. The liquor traffic has had all that. It has attempted, but failed, to corrupt the courts; it has also failed to corrupt a jury of the American people. It has been duly convicted of the most infamous crimes. It is now confined and guarded in the prison cell of war prohibition, while preparations are made for the final execution of the sentence of death.

I have also observed that after conviction the criminal first seeks to get a reprieve, that he may have time to escape by other proceedings, and here, in this last battle for the life of the liquor monster, there is an attempt being made to have war prohibition suspended or repealed. It is an attempt to get a reprieve for this great criminal until the day of his execution in January next. First, by a pardon from the President, but he says he has not the legal right to interfere at the present time, but if he had he would let him go free. And now the prisoner demands a reprieve from this Congress. It will not be allowed. [Applause.]

If I did not know for sure that I was sitting to-day in the Congress of the United States, I should believe I was back at the bar, and that a great criminal had been convicted and his attorneys were trying to save him from prison by the plea that the statute under which he had been tried had been repealed and was void, and that he should go free in spite of his crimes and without regard to the verdict of guilty.

Certain legal questions are presented to save the prisoner. First, it is claimed that war prohibition became effective July 1 last, and that it is not legal now, but has been repealed, because this law was to continue only during the war and until demobilization had been completed, and they claim that the war has ended and that demobilization is now complete. We respectfully submit to this court that neither of these contentions is true. First, war has not ended, and will not end until the treaty of peace has been signed and agreed to by the United States and her enemies and until all the soldiers now in Europe have been relieved of duty, demobilized, and discharged; and, as it looks now, war prohibition will bridge the gap between now and January 16, 1920, when constitutional prohibition will become the supreme law of the land.

But the friends of the prisoner claim further that, admitting that war-time prohibition has not been repealed, that it is still law, then this bill attempts to provide a code of procedure that will enforce war-time prohibition, and that you have no right now to amend war-time prohibition.

This contention must be overruled. If Congress in time of war had a right to enact war-time prohibition, it still has a right in time of war to amend a law that is still in full force. So the technical claim of the prisoner's attorneys must be overruled in the minds of all judges who are unprejudiced and disinterested.

But in this case the friends of the prisoner insist, in the second place, that the prisoner must be discharged and go free, because, as they claim, there is a fatal defect in the indictment on which he was tried and convicted. They state in the minority report of the committee:

> That as to constitutional prohibition, section 2 of the amendment provides that "the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation," and the bill presented is wholly upon the theory that the action of Congress is supreme, and totally ignores the concurrent power of the several States.

Certain legal gentlemen in the House have argued at great length that under this constitutional amendment it will be necessary for the several States and the Federal Government to have the same law with the same penalties, the same evidence, the same kind of indictment, and that such a condition is impossible; therefore the amendment is incapable of enforcement, and we can not enact laws that can be enforced in either State or Nation.

Every lawyer knows that in nearly all criminal laws there are provided different courts to administer them. Municipal and police courts, inferior and supreme courts, have frequently concurrent jurisdiction over certain crimes, and the criminal can be legally charged, tried, and convicted in either one of these courts, because they all have concurrent jurisdiction. Concurrent power is but concurrent jurisdiction. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] who has just addressed you admitted that.

Now, I want you to bear in mind, gentlemen, certain plain facts. The first is that the national constitutional amendment does not repeal the dry laws of any State. They remain the same. The State has the same authority after the national Constitution has been adopted and we enact laws to enforce its provisions to make new prohibition laws to enforce the Constitution. They can not weaken the Constitution. They can not pass new license laws. They can pass prohibitory laws that will carry out the constitutional amendment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] argued strenuously that when you come to the constitutional amendment that it is possible under this bill of enforcement, declaring that a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating, to make void the law, and that we can not under this constitutional amendment enact a valid law that designates what per cent of alcohol shall be considered intoxicating and make a man who sells it as a beverage a criminal. The illustration was used that the State of New Jersey could fix the percentage at 2¾ and this Congress enact a percentage of one-half of 1 per cent, and they say if the State of New Jersey arrests a man for selling against the laws of New Jersey, and they find on the trial that the beverage is less than 2¾ per cent and more than one-half per cent, he would be discharged, and so the law could not be enforced.

Let me say to those legal gentlemen that in such a case the discharged prisoner could be immediately arrested and tried and convicted for a violation of the Federal statutes, and so he would not escape. But opponents of this bill go further and say:

> That the bill goes beyond the prohibition of the constitutional amendment, particularly in defining "intoxicating liquors" so as to include beverages that are not in fact intoxicating.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] says that Congress has no power under the constitutional amendment to declare intoxicating what is not in fact intoxicating.

Article 26 of the constitution of the State of Maine, adopted as part of the State constitution December 3, 1884, provides that:

> The manufacture of intoxicating liquors, not including cider, and the sale and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors are and shall be forever prohibited. Except, however, that the sale and keeping for sale of such liquors for medicinal and mechanical purposes and the arts and the sale and keeping for sale of cider may be permitted under such regulations as the legislature may provide. The legislature shall enact laws with suitable penalties for the suppression of the manufacture, sale, and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors, with the exceptions hereinafter specified.

Section 21, chapter 127, of the Revised Statutes of Maine, 1916, page 1500, provides that:

> No person shall at any time, by himself, his clerk, servant, or agent, directly or indirectly, sell any intoxicating liquors, of whatever origin; wine, ale, porter, strong beer, lager beer, and all other malt liquors, and cider, when kept or deposited with intent to sell the same for tippling purposes or as a beverage, as well as all distilled spirits, are declared intoxicating within the meaning of this chapter; but this enumeration shall not prevent any other pure or mixed liquors from being considered intoxicating.

Under this constitutional amendment and enforcement statute, above quoted, I want to call your attention to a recent decision from my State, namely, State v. Frederickson (101 Maine, p. 37). The defendant was indicted for keeping intoxicating liquor for unlawful sale. Evidence disclosed that he sold for beverage purposes cider which was sweet and not intoxicating. The defendant claimed, as it is done here, that the legislature had no right under the constitutional amendment to enact an enforcement statute that made a crime for selling a beverage that was not in fact intoxicating. He was convicted and appealed to the law court. That court held as follows:

> When it appears that a liquor comes within the scope of the forbidden enumeration, that moment its intoxicating character becomes fixed by law and its nonintoxicating character as a matter of fact becomes entirely immaterial with respect to the application of the statute.
> The constitutional right of the legislature to regulate or prohibit the sale and keeping of intoxicating liquors and to declare certain liquors intoxicating within the meaning of the law governing intoxicating liquors, irrespective of the intoxicating character of such liquors as a matter of fact, both under the State and Federal Constitution, have been so universally answered in the affirmative, both by the decisions in our own State and by the Supreme Court of the United States, that it is no longer a question for argument or even doubt.

The people have decreed that this criminal of the ages shall die. Nothing short of death can satisfy our obligations to those we represent. Under our oath of office we are to support, maintain, and defend the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution condemns the liquor traffic forever, and while the friends of the traffic may seek for pardon, reprieve, and delay, this is the last battle. If the friends of this criminal fail here in the court of the people there will be no appeal, and I want to say in conclusion that I believe that every plea of the prisoner will be overruled. Every delay will be condemned; every technical objection will be defeated, and the hour will shortly come when there will be no further attempts made for reprieves, pardons, or new trials. The liquor traffic will be forsaken by its attorneys and deserted by its pretended friends. Members of Congress will be left free to pursue their duties without fear of the liquor vote. No longer will the saloon be in politics. No longer will it dictate legislation. No longer will it be a specter of fear and dread by the most humble citizen of America.

At exactly 1 minute past 12 o'clock midnight, on the 16th day of next January this monster criminal will be taken from the war-time prohibition cell by the officers of the law and conducted to the gallows of public opinion. There deserted by friends the black cap will be drawn over its distorted visage. No prayers will be said in its behalf. It will not have the benefit of the clergy, for it has no soul. "It is neither man nor woman, neither brute nor human." Its vile form will be swung off into the darkness of oblivion forever. It will be buried in the potter's field without a stone to mark the spot, for the wise man has said "the name of the wicked shall rot." So may all the enemies of the people perish.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ECHOLS].

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Chairman, the State, West Virginia, which I have the honor to represent in part, has been in the prohibition column since July 1, 1914. The question of ratifying a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in that State was submitted at the general election held in November, 1912. Out of approximately 240,000 votes cast at that election, there was a majority of approximately 90,000 in favor of ratification. The legislature elected at the same time, which convened in January, 1913, enacted what was considered, I believe, at that time the most drastic prohibition law that existed anywhere in the country. The law became effective July 1, 1914. There was much discussion, both in the State and out of the State, as to the probable results that would follow the enactment of this law. I had an opportuntiy to observe at close range such results. By the prohibition act the State tax commissioner was made prohibition commissioner. During the whole time from the date the act became effective until the 1st day of March, 1919, I was assistant State tax commissioner, and, although I took but little part in its enforcement, had an excellent opportunity to observe the results of the same.

It is stated by a few in the State and by many outside of the State that there have been more drunkenness and greater use of alcoholic liquors in the State since the law became effective than there were before. To that statement I want to make a most emphatic denial. In my honest but humble judgment there is not now and never has been, since the date the act became effective, 10 per cent as much drunkenness or 10 per cent as much use of liquor as there was before. The economic conditions in my State are better than they ever were before. No great industrial State in the Union has less Bolshevism or less anarchy than we have. Her social conditions are better. "The masses of the people in the industrial districts are better fed, better clothed, and better contented, and generally more prosperous" since the adoption of prohibition than before. The laborer and his employer have fewer controversies and they settle them with less difficulty.

While the population of the State has increased approximately 25 per cent since the adoption of prohibition, the population of the hospitals and the insane asylums has been largely reduced. Insanity from the use of alcoholic drinks is not nearly so prevalent as it was before. With this tremendous increase in population, the population of the penitentiary has decreased since July 1, 1914, 28.5 per cent. In many of the industrial counties, where crime was raging, the criminal courts of such counties have been abolished by legislative enactment, and in some of the smaller counties the jails have gone for months without a single occupant. No such condition respecting crime ever prevailed before the adoption of prohibition.

Prior to the enactment of our prohibition law I had the honor to serve one of the large counties of my State as prosecuting attorney. At the time of my election the legalized liquor traffic was engaged in largely in my county, and while I do not attempt to be absolutely accurate, I know I make no extravagant statement when I say that at least 75 per cent of the crimes that I was called upon to prosecute were the result of the use of intoxicating liquors. There were numerous murders, and every single one of them, with the exception of one, was traceable to the use of intoxicating liquor. What was true in this respect in my county was largely true in the other great counties of the State. Crime began to decline immediately upon the adoption of prohibition and continues to this good day.

In support of what I have said I desire to submit a statement showing accurately the number of prisoners confined in the penitentiary at Moundsville during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1914, and all succeeding years up to July 1, 1918:

1913–1914, 427 prisoners received; no decrease.
1914–1915, 388 prisoners received; decrease, 11 per cent.
1915–1916, 335 prisoners received; decrease, 19 per cent.
1916–1917, 324 prisoners received; decrease, 24.1 per cent.
1917–1918, 305 prisoners received; decrease, 28.5 per cent.

When the question of prohibition was submitted, the great majority in its favor came from no one class. The coal operator and the coal miner voted for prohibition; the merchant and the clerk voted for prohibition; the doctor and the lawyer did likewise. The great industrial sections gave great majorities in favor of prohibition. The cities, the towns, and the villages did the same thing.

On account of West Virginia's geographical environment, there is perhaps no State in the Union so badly situated with respect to the enforcement of a prohibition law, and it is doubtful if there is a State in the Union that has had a prohibition law for any considerable period of time where there has been such a tremendous effort to break down the same as there has been in West Virginia. We have been surrounded almost entirely by wet territory. To the north of us is Pennsylvania, wet; to the east of us are Maryland and Virginia, Maryland wet all the time and Virginia wet most of the time; to the south of us is Virginia, and, as stated, wet most of the time; to the west of us are Kentucky and Ohio, wet all the time. With our population diversified as it is, with thousands of foreigners in the industrial sections who have been taught by the saloon advocate that they are being deprived of their personal liberty, it is but natural that the enforcement of any prohibition law would meet with stubborn resistance. In spite of the difficulties that have had to be overcome in the enforcement of the law, it is my judgment that no State in the Union has had a more successful enforcement of such law than West Virginia.

I have heard since coming to Washington that there is a great change in sentiment in my State respecting the attitude of our people toward prohibition. There is no foundation for such statement. The people of my State would under no circumstances return to the open saloon. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, if I thought that the prohibition law would accomplish what some of its ardent admirers think that it will accomplish, and be acceptable to the people of the United States after a popular vote, such as I think should be had upon an amendment to the Constitution as inquisitorial as this is, I would not stand upon the floor of this House this afternoon to offer any opposition to the passage of this law. I do not believe that there should be opposition to enforcement provisions of a law really wanted by the people. I am confident, however, that the measure as it appears in the House at the present time is not one that the people of the United States, through the several States, intended when they supported the prohibition measure. It is my conviction that it is nonenforcible, and that it is bound to stir up strife and trouble at a time when every effort ought to be made to coordinate all the forces of sound government and progress throughout the land.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], who has just taken his seat, comes from a State where prohibition has been the law now for, I think, half a century, and he and the other Representatives from the State of Maine can tell you that the law has never been even reasonably enforced, unless within very recent months. I know from personal observation, extending over a period of 25 years, that bar rooms have been conducted openly in many of the big cities in Maine. I know that drunkenness ran riot, that murders have been committed, and that the State of Maine, through its daily newspapers, exposed to the world the fact that, although Maine had a prohibition law upon its statute books, it was not enforced. Portland and Lewiston, two cities, were conspicuous in this respect.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman understand that the troubles which Maine has had in the enforcement of the prohibitory law have been due to the fact of importations from wet Portsmouth in New Hampshire and Boston in Massachusetts? [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the fault of the Republican administration in Maine, which has been in power for 50 years, and not the fault of the Boston dealer, who had a right to sell to anybody and everybody.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HERSEY. Have the Republicans had control of Boston very lately?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not had control of Boston for years. It was not the fault of the people of Boston who sold it; they were engaged in the liquor business legitimately. They paid license money to the United States and Massachusetts both. The officers of the State of Maine who permitted it to enter the State and then permitted it to be sold illegally were to blame. Why, the gentleman from Maine who has just taken his seat knows that prohibition in Maine has been a standing joke for years, and as one of the consequences the growth of Maine has been less than almost any section of the country, though its natural resources are boundless, and I am putting forward the State of Maine as an example. The gentleman will not deny the statement that for years open barrooms, patronized by thousands, were openly conducted in the city of Portland, and that open barrooms were openly conducted in the city of Lewiston with the connivance of the local officials.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. And not only did they get liquor from outside places, but they manufactured the worst kind of stuff called liquor, and the courts have been filled with cases, but seldom, if ever, did a jail sentence follow.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HERSEY. "The gentleman from Maine" wishes to deny as strongly as he can the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to open bars in Maine. The gentleman from Maine wishes to admit that under importations from Massachusetts——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If you will give me additional time, I will yield further to the gentleman. I want to be fair.

Mr. HERSEY. Do you not wish me to explain?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but in your own time. Mine is very limited. I have seen these bars and talked with the managers, who told me they were open for the sale of liquor from 6 in the morning until 11 at night.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. And the city of Portsmouth, where the gentleman says liquor was shipped into Maine, has been under prohibition also for almost a like period of time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. I was told by one of the managers of one of the biggest hotels in Portland—and I will name it if the gentleman wants me to name it—that he had the permission of the authorities to open at 6 o'clock in the morning and close at 11 o'clock at night; and if that statement is not true, and the gentleman can prove it is not true, I will resign my seat in Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman admit that there is a distinction between the enforcement of a law by State courts and the enforcement of a law by Federal courts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas that this is an assault upon the courts of Maine. I am talking about the practicality of the enforcement of this kind of a law, and I am calling the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that Maine has had this law upon its statute books for 50 years, and it has been found to be impracticable of enforcement and a positive detriment to the development of the State.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman thinks this prohibition law can not be enforced, what in thunder are the whisky men fighting it for? [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not a whisky man. I never use liquor, except as a medicine. I do not touch tobacco. I oppose this bill because it is un-American and a menace to good government, in my opinion. I have been the mayor of a big city, and I understand the workings of the population of these big cities, and, judging from my contact with the masses of the people, you can not drive them into doing something that is repellant to their very natures. I contend if Maine wants prohibition, she is entitled to have it. If Texas wants prohibition, she is entitled to have it. And if Kansas wants prohibition, she is entitled to have it. I agree with everything that the gentleman said about Kansas yesterday—about the wonderful State they have out there and its wonderful population and their achievements under prohibition. But we have done equally great things in Massachusetts under a license system, and we do not want this law. It has been foisted upon the people of Massachusetts, not by popular vote but by the legislature, and on a popular test that was made some six months ago towns that never voted for license in Massachusetts, particularly in the southeastern portions of it and in the western portions of it, voted for license for the first time in their history, and I stand here to-day transmitting that sentiment in Massachusetts as expressed by the people of Massachusetts to Members of this House, so that they can understand what the expression of the people of Massachusetts is upon this question.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I am not yielding all my time.

Mr. RUCKER. Did not the Legislature of Massachusetts ratify this amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Then should not the gentleman speak as an exponent of the legislature?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The legislature did not speak for the people, as I said before, on this measure, and if the people had their say Massachusetts would have voted wet. In every place in Massachusetts where the test has been made the people have spoken on this question since the legislature acted generally the other way. I know that the Massachusetts Legislature acted under the coercion of the Anti-Saloon League, and part because of inside politics of the Republican Party at that time the drys carried the day. It is my belief that on a test vote to-morrow Massachusetts will be shown to be decidedly against this measure. I do not think that I am misstating the facts in the case when I say that this present bill, which denies to the farmer the right to make his cider, and denies to the small householder the right to make his wine, that puts police surveillance over them, so that at midnight these policemen can come in, as they did in the State of Virginia, when they entered trains and ransacked the wardrobes of women and committed assaults which bordered on indecency—if this bill is put before the people of Massachusetts the candidates who accept it will be defeated, and the man who stands for governor of the State and opposes it will be triumphantly elected. I am willing to go on record on that statement now.

I do not want to take up the time of the House. I believe in temperance. I have preached it and practiced it all my lifetime, but I know Boston, and I know New England, with its 65 per cent of foreign extraction. They are anxious that Kansas should succeed, and they are anxious that Nebraska should succeed.

But they want to live their own lives up there in that section of the country. We need labor. You need it here in Washington. You can not get it. We are 4,000,000 men short in the country. Last night's papers said there were 10,000 jobs in Washington and no takers. The soldiers of the country have been called to go into the fields to reap the harvest in Kansas. Are the soldiers going to be called in Boston to do the labor there? Contractors told me, when home for the holiday, that labor conditions were most serious. Are soldiers to be called into the coal mines of Pennsylvania to do the labor there when the shortage comes? Are they to be called for the operation of the great steamship companies that must be efficiently handled to do the business of the country? No. We must have labor, and where would this country be to-day but for the foreign labor of the past 100 years; and I ask you to listen to the statement of that great man Samuel Gompers on this subject. I say that he did as much in his own way in the winning of the war as did Gen. Foch. When Samuel Gompers, Gold bless him, stands in the committee room and says that he represents two million and a half of laboring men who are opposed to this bill, when everybody is trying to appease labor, not in demagogic fashion but because of what it represents, the real worth in everything human and labor alike, when capital is trying to arrange a program for the reconstruction of the fiscal, industrial, and commercial activities of the country, what a time to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery of the country by attempting to thrust this bill down the throats of the people of the United States. Therefore, speaking for the labor and capital of the district I represent, speaking for New England sentiment, its foreign and native population, as proud of one as of the other, as long as they are good Americans, I say to you that we want you to live your own life, but you should not tell us in Massachusetts how we must live our lives. Speaking for the everyday citizens of this country who want their wine, who want their beer, who want the opportunity to live their own lives in their own way, I stand unalterably opposed to the passage of this bill as being inimical to the welfare of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I, as one Member of this House, am getting sick and tired of hearing men stand up here and continually brand the workingmen of this country as wearing the label of the whisky and beer traffic. [Applause.] My good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] just referred to labor along this line. A few days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] made the statement that over 90 per cent of the workingmen of this country were against prohibition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] just referred to that great man, Mr. Samuel Gompers, who led the demonstration against prohibition that was held on the Capitol steps here a few days ago, in which he stated Mr. Gompers spoke for the workingmen of the country. Now, for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] I want to read to him a statement made by Mr. Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, a few days ago, when he was questioned by a newspaper man regarding Mr. Gompers's statement. Mr. Stone said:

There is one organization of labor that Mr. Gompers did not speak for and could not speak for when he made the declaration you refer to. I mean the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, comprising 84,000 members in the United States and Canada. For 20 years there has been a law upon the books of our association prohibiting its members using liquor, whether on or off duty. In 1915 the brotherhood, by unanimous vote, adopted a resolution in favor of nation-wide prohibition, and we have never changed our views as to the wisdom of that action.

Yet the gentleman from Boston [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and other Members stand here on this floor and would have you believe that over 90 per cent of the union men of this country are against prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will just wait a moment, I will be glad to yield to him.

Now, how do they pass these resolutions which they put through in the united labor congress and in their central body? I will tell you how they pull this off. Here in the city of Washington there are probably 24 or 25 different crafts affiliated with organizel labor. There is, I think, approximately 3,000 machinists in the city of Washington. Most of them are engaged in work at the navy yard. That body of machinists, numbering about 3,000, have a representation of five delegates in the central labor body in this city. The carpenters have a representation of five delegates in that same central labor body. The liquor industry organized every craft engaged in that business. They organized just as many separate and distinct organizations as they possibly could. For instance, they have the beer-wagon drivers, the bottlers, the bartenders, the waiters, the ice men, the brewery engineers, and many others, all affiliated with the liquor industry, and every one of these bodies, even though its membership may number only 100 men, has the same representation in the united labor body of five delegates. In other words, 150 bartenders here in the city of Washington would have the same representation in the central labor body as the 3,000 machinists here in the city have. They go into their united labor body, they pack the convention, they pass these resolutions, and then they come to the people of the country and tell you that all of organized labor in this country is against the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

I have stated before on the floor of this House, and I will repeat for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], that Ohio is the fourth greatest industrial State in the Union to-day. Last fall we had a vote on State-wide prohibition, a direct vote of the people, and Ohio went dry by about 30,000 majority. If you leave out Cincinnati and Hamilton County, in which this city is located, and I believe it is the wettest spot on the face of the earth, you will find that the great industrial State of Ohio, with its thousands upon thousands of workingmen in its factories, its steel mills, and other industries, cast a dry majority vote last fall of over 75,000. [Applause.] Yet you men stand here and tell us that all the workingmen are opposed to prohibition. Take Summit County, in which is located the city of Akron, the greatest center of the rubber industry in the world. I think the city of Akron now has a population of about 175,000 people. There are 50,000 or 60,000 skilled mechanics working in the various branches of the rubber industry in that city. And last fall, in a State-wide prohibition election, Summit County, in which is located the city of Akron, gave the largest dry majority of any county in the State of Ohio—3,500. [Applause.] Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to say that I made no such statement that all of the labor men were against prohibition. I said that the labor convention in Atlantic City, according to the returns the men that voted against prohibition, represented 2,450,000 workers. I contend that before this becomes a law, as far as our part of the country is concerned, and I do not pretend to speak for any other, we ought to be allowed to have some such expression of opinion as was had in Ohio. If Ohio wants prohibition, it ought to have it, but we do not want it.

Mr. COOPER. I do not believe that the representatives at Atlantic City expressed the sentiment of 2,000,000 laboring men. The best way is to take a direct vote, and where it has been tried. For instance, take the county of Mahoning, where is located the city of Youngstown and which has the greatest steel industry in the country outside of Pittsburgh. We have over 50,000 men working in the steel industry in the city of Youngstown. As I stated, this city has a population of about 40,000 of foreign birth or foreign blood. It is a well-known fact, and no one who has followed the wet and dry returns in that State will deny, that about 99 per cent of those people that vote vote wet. Do not forget that. All of the business men and professional men in that great industrial city are not dry. At the November election last year, on a State-wide prohibition issue, the city of Youngstown, that great industrial city, not the county but the city itself, had a dry majority of over 1,200. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts who voted the city dry if it was not the workingmen?

There were some delegates at the convention at Atlantic City that attempted to speak for the workingmen in the city of Youngstown when their own vote last fall was over 1,200 majority in favor of prohibition.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] has stated that there is 75 per cent of the population in New England foreign, and then he asks if the 45 States that have ratified prohibition should be permitted to cram this down the throats of the 75 per cent in New England.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say cram down the throats of the 45 States; I said New England States.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like for the gentleman to expatiate further on that proposition, as to whether or not the country should be run by the American people or by the foreigners in the New England States.

Mr. COOPER. In answer to that, the gentleman from Massachusetts a few moments ago said that we needed labor in this country, and I took it for granted that he meant that if we adopted prohibition the laboring men would leave the country. I say, in the name of God, if the people who come to this country have more respect for their booze than they have for the Constitution and the flag of the United States, let them go and not come back into this country again. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we have adopted a constitutional amendment to the organic law of this country. It is the first time in the history of this great Nation that any man in public life, any man that holds the position that Samuel Gompers does, president of the American Federation of Labor, has stood up in public and said that prohibition has resulted in Bolshevism and anarchy. [Applause.] There is no question in my mind that when Mr. Gompers makes that statement he encourages that very thing. [Applause.]

I have spoken time and time again on this question. There is not anything more to say on the moral side. We all know the evils of intoxicating liquor, but what do we see while considering this bill? We see the Representatives from the State of New York, from Boston, and from Hamilton, Ohio, which is an adjunct of Cincinnati, the Representatives of St. Louis, these men who have come from districts where the big breweries have their money invested in the brewing industry—we see them opposing this measure. I want to appeal to the Republicans on this side of the House, to this Republican Congress, that the people are going to hold us responsible for the passage of this prohibition-enforcement measure. I do not like to see some Republicans play into the hands of the St. Louis breweries and the New York liquor dealers. That is what some of them are doing at this time. There is an organized effort—and everyone knows it is true—an organized effort here now to dillydally and delay the passage of this bill. We have had national prohibition since the 1st of July, and now we are trying to enact an enforcement measure. What do we see? Filibuster after filibuster to try and stop the passage of this measure. I believe the Republican Party should stand back of it now that it has become the organic law of the land. Now that war-time prohibition is here in fact, I believe that it is our duty and the duty of the majority on this side of the House to get back of this measure and enact it into law as soon as possible. I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this debate tells the same old story. For 10 years I have heard the same plaints as those uttered by the opponents of this bill this afternoon. Always they declare that prohibition does not prohibit and that the more antiliquor laws we pass the more liquor will be sold. Of course, if these statements were true every brewer and distiller and liquor dealer in the land would be behind this measure. [Applause.] It furnishes a splendid test of their theory. It is the final act in the drama which depicts the rise, progress, and downfall of John Barleycorn. And the last desperate efforts to prevent its passage proves how well the liquor intertsts know that it means the end for them. When John Barleycorn goes off the stage now he goes off to stay.

Mr. Chairman, this fight has been going on for generations. It began at the very birth of the Republic, when Dr. Benjamin Rush, chairman of the Committee on Independence in the Continental Congress, published his book on "The Evil Effects of Alcohol." For 143 years the war has raged. Defeated times without number, the forces of sobriety and efficiency and morality have returned to the attack against the liquor traffic.

Every year has seen new recruits added to the forces fighting against that traffic. Scorned and ridiculed at first, these fighters for a sober America at last marshaled an invincible army. They knew that no question is ever finally settled until it is settled right. Little by little they advanced their standards. Where the vanguard rested to-day the rear camped on the morrow.

During this long struggle the liquor traffic fought without regard to the laws of man or God. It defied its foes with the brazen impudence born of long success. It undertook to control government. It named its own candidates for office. It made cowards of public men. It manipulated the ballot and robbed the ballot box. It purchased newspapers to deceive the people. It sent out paid lecturers to misrepresent the fact. It threatened business men with ruin and boycotted those who had the courage of their convictions. It stepped forward to fight by the side of every commercialized vice which was under fire from an indignant citizenship. It allied itself with the Prussian foe against which America fought in a death grapple.

Then the end came. The people of the United States issued their sovereign decree that the liquor traffic be outlawed. They determined that no compromise was possible. They demanded a fundamental solution for a fundamental evil.

By a two-thirds majority of Congress, backed by the ratification of 45 out of 48 States, they spoke their will. They insisted upon putting the liquor business out of Government, the Government out of the liquor business, and the liquor business out of business. [Applause.]

Does anyone here mean to say that the people of America did not mean that? Such talk is folly. The people demanded the banishment of the liquor traffic—root and branch. With all their power they said that very thing, and they expect Congress to obey their command.

And still, in the very face of these facts, we are expected to listen to these "constitutional" arguments so volubly expressed on this floor. When I hear these arguments I thank God that I am not a constitutional lawyer. When all other pleas fail, the Constitution is the last refuge of these experts in keeping the people from securing what they desire. It is curious to note, also, that they always use the Constitution to shield the robbers, never the robbed; always the exploiters, never the people who are being exploited.

My friends, there is one fundamental principle in the Constitution which these experts overlook. It is that the people's will is the supreme law.

That will is expressed in orderly and convincing procedure when the required number of States ratify a proposed constitutional amendment submitted by a two-thirds vote of Congress.

That has been done. This amendment is now a part of the sacred Constitution itself, and its enforcement should be a matter dear to the hearts of these loud worshipers of the Constitution.

Not only that, but the very foundation of our constitutional system is that Congress shall be the lawmaking body. If Congress can not pass the laws the people desire or can not enact them in a manner to be understood, then the whole system falls.

I maintain that every day's delay in passing this enforcement measure gives new grounds for a loss of respect on the part of the people for Congress itself.

Here is one situation which presents itself: Congress enacted that after the 1st day of November, 1917, the District of Columbia should be dry. Not satisfied with that, Congress went still further and passed a "bone-dry" law for the District of Columbia.

Then Congress passed the war-time prohibition law, with still more stringent provisions for violations. That meant three laws, each more stringent than the one preceding. Not even a constitutional lawyer would contend that Congress meant anything else than the prohibition of the sale of liquor in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia.

But at this moment there are 150 indictments against liquor sellers in this city being held up on the ground that the war-time prohibition law, with no enforcement provisions, repealed the other two laws.

It is being seriously argued in the court on behalf of violators of the laws passed by Congress that there is no law whatever in force since the 1st of July in Washington to prevent any man from selling any and all kinds of liquor. It is declared that until the enforcement provisions carried in this bill before us are passed all other congressional enactments fall.

Now, it seems to me that these gentlemen who are so fearful that Congress will bring itself into disrepute by carrying out the command of the people might well consider the discredit which follows on inaction. In any case Congress need not be concerned about the purpose of the liquor interests to perpetuate an evil. Its concern should be in the clear purpose of the Nation to wipe that evil out and act accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, all these camouflage arguments made by advocates of the liquor traffic are useless. This war is won. The liquor traffic was brought to the bar of the American conscience, was given a fair trial, and declared guilty.

The very few days of trial, even under unfavorable conditions, abundantly prove the claims of those who favored the overthrow of King Alcohol.

In Pittsburgh, that greatest workshop of the world, the reports show amazing benefits, with approbation on every side.

Yesterday I clipped from the Pittsburgh Leader, one of the largest and best newspapers in Pennsylvania, the following news item:

Crime in Pittsburgh "just ain't."

At central police station to-day only three prisoners passed in review before Magistrate John J. Sweeney with the customary smile and "Good morning, judge."

Magistrate Sweeney is loafing on the job. The desk sergeant is weary for want of company, and the turnkey fears his wrist will go stale. The police reporter is frantic, and from present indications his job is about as safe as a bartender's.

In morals court, Magistrate Tensard De Wolfe sat on his bench with all the dignity of his office. The court was instituted to raise the morals of the city, and the magistrate had only one case before him.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have not the time.

Mr. CALDWELL. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I want to finish this clipping:

The usual number of offenders ranging from 60 to 125 per day who greeted Magistrate Sweeney in alcoholic days has dwindled down to two or three. In all other police courts the magistrates are scratching their heads and wondering what's come over our fair city. But three arrests in a day in the downtown district seems incredible, and even the officers are scratching their heads.

The police patrol wagons are showing the effects, for dust is growing fast and thick on the well-worn seats.

It looks like a long vacation for policemen, magistrates, and police reporters, and the sad part of it is that the boss sometimes gets tired filling the pay envelope when there is no work to be done.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In a moment. Mr. Chairman, the last paragraph of that news item suggests another phase of this question. It was brought forward by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] this morning, when he mourned the loss of revenue by the passage of this measure.

When you realize that the cost of all the tremendous organization of courts, jails, prisons, reformatories, and so forth, will be so greatly decreased by the operation of this law, you begin to see its real bearing on the revenue question.

The last figures that I compiled show that there is spent every year in America the sum of $1,373,000,000 for the operation of our machinery to deal with criminals and crime. With this report and similar reports coming in from every city in the land, it is easy to see how that immense sum may be cut down to a fraction of its size by the elimination of the evil which makes necessary such expenditures. The fact is that the liquor traffic never has been a revenue producer. It is the most ruinous tax collector Uncle Sam ever had, and thinking Americans have acted on that knowledge.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. I was going to ask the gentleman when he was reading the newspaper clipping if he did not think that perhaps the newspaper reporter who wrote it had taken a "shot" instead of a drink before he wrote it?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the reporter wrote the truth as he found it, and it is the truth that hurts the liquor business.

The great Pittsburgh district is no stronghold of that business. The citizenship is largely made up of men who toil in mill and mine. They produce the vast quantities of iron and steel and coal which have made Pittsburgh famous around the world. They know their own best interests demand the overthrow of this evil, which has corrupted American politics and laid burdens on every American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes, I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER. My friend comes from a great industrial district. Since prohibition went into effect there has he seen any uprising of Bolshevism and anarchy that Mr. Gompers speaks about?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; but, on the contrary, I have seen satisfaction and pleasure over the destruction of this enemy of every American worker. [Applause.]

The citizens of my district believe in the enforcement of the law which the people of America have written into the Constitution. They believe in the new day and the new America. They have seen the evils of the system of the jungle law with "every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost." They know that the new spirit is one of interdependence, where every man must recognize that he owes obligations to his neighbors. They have seen in the light of a world on fire by war the absolute necessity of unity for the common good. They know that this measure we are discussing to-day is a product of that feeling in America, and that the constitutional amendment which needs this measure to make it effective was the deliberate, long-considered purpose of the American people.

You may rest assured that the citizenship of my district and of America will consider any attempt to overthrow that purpose as an act of faithlessness and treason to them and to the essentials of the American system of Government. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege of revising and extending my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the fair judgment of the people of America that this Congress should pass reasonable laws to enforce the Federal prohibition amendment, and if that were the only question involved here I would have nothing to say. I am entirely conscious of the fact that it is probably true that anything I shall say will not in the least affect the result of the vote on this bill. However, I believe the war prohibition legislation here proposed is vicious and unworthy of Congress. I do not want this occasion to pass without arising here to protest. I believe it is unworthy of this Congress for a reason that is as old as Mount Sinai—he who abuses power is unworthy of it.

During the war we prohibited the manufacture of distilled spirits, we limited the quantity of fermented spirits, many restrictions were placed upon the sale of all beverages. On the whole, control of the liquor question during the war worked well. The exceptions were some sections where local authorities failed to enforce proper regulations of saloons.

While the war lasted there would have been a logical reason to support war prohibition. But the historian of the future will search the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in vain for a logical or an appealing reason why this Nation, that went through the war without prohibition, should enact "war prohibition" after the war was over.

No man with candid intelligence can rise here and say that Congress now has a fair, legitimate right to impose war prohibition upon this country. War prohibition presupposes a war. The only right Congress has to enact prohibition before the Federal amendment goes into effect is the war power of Congress as based upon the necessity of war. This legislation was enacted after the war was over and after the armistice was signed, 10 days after, and it was made to go into effect eight months after. Is there any reason that appeals to an intelligent man for contending there was any war necessity for legislation which by its terms is not to go into effect until eight months after the war was over? War prohibition to go into effect after a war is a fraud upon the face of it. In its enactment "war prohibition" was a legislative absurdity. And to repeat the offense now that the war is eight months behind us would be legislative buffoonery.

When the historian of the future reviews the record of this and the last Congress for the purpose of getting a true estimate of the men who composed them, what can be his conclusion as to the wisdom, stability of character, and mental quality of legislative authors of an act, that was passed and signed in the exercise of war powers, providing for war prohibition to go into effect eight months after the war was over? What conclusion can he draw from such a situation that will reflect creditably upon the honor, wisdom, or patriotism of those responsible for such a freakish legislative child?

The Federal prohibition amendment provides that it shall go into effect one year after its ratification. It has been denied that the prohibitionists promised one year to this country in which to adjust itself to prohibition. There was no other legitimate reason for delaying the time for the operation of the amendment. However, I want to read to you the words of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the time the Federal prohibition amendment was submitted to Congress. The distinguished chairman who had charge of the measure at that time made this statement in reference to the amendment which provided for one year before the act should go into effect:

> While we prohibitionists desire to have the country go dry, we do not propose to let our zeal in that great cause destroy our sense of justice, and I for one was willing to advocate the right of the brewers and distillers to have one year to wind up their business. We have distinguished precedents for this in the action of nearly all the dry States. Most of the States have given them a year in which they may wind up their business. * * * I think it is a perfectly fair amendment, and I will be very glad to vote for it, and I hope the dry Members will vote for it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Dec. 17, 1917, p. 432.)

And they did vote for it unanimously. Those who advocated the adoption of the Federal prohibition amendment went to every section of this country. They went out to California, where we have our vineyards, and they said, "See how fair we are, how liberal we are. You shall have one year after this act goes into effect to dispose of your present business, to readjust yourself to the conditions that Federal prohibition will impose." And to-day, after the Federal prohibition amendment has been ratified and before the year is up, the same men who took that position before this country are demanding that we enact war prohibition eight months after the war is over, in violation of the promises they made. If a corrupt political boss in the city of New York or Chicago or Philadelphia would make a promise like that and repudiate it, he would be condemned as a corruptionist in every newspaper and from every platform in America. [Applause.]

So I say to you prohibitionists, who like to talk about good morals and good citizenship, exercise the good morals and good citizenship that are involved in keeping your word to this country. [Applause.]

I especially want to call the attention of the House to this fact: If this war prohibition act should be repealed, it would not mean that the wet condition would be in force in any dry territory in this country, but it would simply mean that you would restore to the wet States the privilege of self-determination upon the question until the Federal amendment goes into effect. Now, I am unable to understand how a man who has absorbed the principles of local self-government in America—the greatest foundation of human liberty that this world has known—how a man from a State like Kansas, for instance, that has prohibition, should be greatly agitated about denying the privilege to Massachusetts, or New York, or California of exercising the same right that Kansas exercised—the right of determining this question for itself. [Applause.]

It seems unreasonable when Congress has only a colorable, if any, power at all of enforcing prohibition on unwilling States. I am particularly interested in the situation of the grape growers of California. To-day there is hanging on the vines in California, approaching harvest time, perhaps the greatest wine-grape crop in the history of California, as reported by the Agricultural Department only three weeks ago. If this legislation goes into effect, the farmers of California will be able to harvest only a small part of that crop. Part of those grapes are good for other purposes, but a great part of them are marketable only for the purpose of putting them into wine. If this purported "war legislation" shall be continued or go into effect eight months after the war is over, and thereby rob those farmers of California of the fruits of their labor, it will be one of the greatest outrages committed in the legislative history of the United States. [Applause.] And I am here to-day to say there are politicians in power in this country who have the idea that they can traffic in the question of prohibition and act on the theory that they can politically sell out the legitimate rights of the grape growers of California and thereby advance their own political fortunes. I want to say that that thing can not be pulled off without my standing here and branding it as the political pandering that it is. [Applause.]

Now, what happened while the war was going on? While the sons of these grape growers were going to France and fighting and dying for this country, every night the mothers of those boys were praying for their safe return and for victory to American arms. While they were doing that, dry lobbyists were here in Washington trying to persuade this Congress to rob the parents of those boys of their lifetime earnings. To-day the sons of some of those grape growers lie sleeping the eternal sleep in the soil of France. It is un-American, it is unworthy of the American Congress, to-day, under the pretense of war prohibition, under only a color of right, to rob those parents of what their industry has legitimately earned.

When Federal prohibition goes into effect Congress will have full power that it should legitimately exercise at that time to impose prohibition but not now.

While the war was going on I picked up one of the publications that are commonly sent to Members of Congress by these zealous representatives that I believe to a large extent misrepresent the churches and organizations for which they pretend to speak. One minister quoted therein stated, in substance, "After the war is over there will be a revulsion against prohibition legislation, and therefore we should be zealous to put this over now before conditions change." In other words, it was that man's conception of the duty of an American legislative body to take advantage of the opportunity, the psychology of war, to place upon the statute books of the American people a law that would afterwards be offensive to them. That is the standpoint of a zealot, but it is not the legitimate attitude of one who would legislate with the best interests of this country at heart.

The other day when the chairman stood before us to present this bill he warned us that if we did not support it we would be defeated. His close affiliation with the Anti-Saloon League, I fear, has caused him to acquire something of its philosophy. To my mind it makes not a particle of difference what the votes yesterday were or what the votes to-morrow may be. The man who comes to this Congress is unfit to be here unless he is willing to go down to defeat for voting for what he believes to be right. And when the time comes that the standard of American politics will be to count noses and vote according to the noses, the real basis of liberty in America will have departed. [Applause.]

The philosophy of the Anti-Saloon League is that every American Congressman thinks more of his seat than he does of anything else. A few months ago I was in the office of a Senator of the United States when a lobbyist came into the office and said to his clerk, the clerk of a Senator who had followed the prohibition cause loyally all the way through, "We want you to give the Senator to understand that if he does not vote so-and-so in a committee on a certain bill, we are going to follow him up to his State and defeat him for reelection." And that man was not kicked out of that office, as he deserved to be. The philosophy of the dry boss is to-day the same as used to be the philosophy of the liquor boss: "If you can not rule an officer, ruin him."

Now, that is the standard that is adopted. Last November the President signed this war prohibition act 10 days after the war was ended. The President is responsible primarily to the American people for a war prohibition act that went into effect after the war was over. Congress passed the act before the armistice. Immaterial details were agreed on in conference afterwards, but it was the President's signature, after the war was over, that made it possible to have prohibition go into effect when the war was over. Now, when that happened some of these lobbyists in the dry cause thought th y had the President boot, baggage, and all. Under their leadership they had induced the President to do that absurd thing. But the President was excusable to a large degree. This dry measure was connected with an Agricultural bill as a rider at a time when the President's mind was busily engaged on other great questions. Had the President courageously vetoed the measure, it would have been reenacted without the rider when Congress reassembled within two weeks. It is commendable in the President that after a few months expired and he saw what was going to be the inevitable result of this law he recommended it should be repealed. Then what happened? Every one of these papers, such as the Clipsheet, that comes to Members of Congress, started a vicious attack on the President of the United States. Their attack is mildly summarized in these words:

The strong condemnation of the church has settled upon the head of the President.

In other words, they are going to excommunicate the President because he recommended the ban on beer and wine should be lifted. The whole Clipsheet, purporting to be published by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Church, was devoted to detraction and vicious attacks upon the President. That was simply a method of flourishing the club and trying to force the President of the United States to hoist the white flag of surrender to the Anti-Saloon League. A prominent dry declared, "The President will never lift the ban; he is afraid to."

What happened in the next issue of the Clipsheet?

It contained this language in black type:

Notice: No man can be elected President of the United States in 1920 who is not openly and emphatically in favor of strict enforcement of the prohibition law. Every reform agency and every church and every informed patriot will fight a man of any other type to a finish, no matter whether he is Republican, Democrat, or Mugwump.

In other words, the notice of the Anti-Saloon League to every man in this country who might aspire to be President of the United States was, "Come and place your neck under the yoke of a church political organization or you can not be President of the American Republic." [Applause.]

Another recent issue of the Clipsheet was entirely devoted to an attack upon the delegates of the American Federation of Labor who gathered in front of the Capitol requesting the repeal of war prohibition so far as it prohibited the use of beer containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol. Delegates representing over 2,000,000 union laborers in the United States gathered in a quiet, orderly, law-abiding manner in front of the Capitol Building and as humble American citizens presented their protest against what they believed to be an unjust usurpation of their rights. The Clipsheet headed its tirade, "The Bolsheviki Marches on Congress."

In further describing these men, representing the great bodies of union labor in America, the following words were used:

Vicious liquor interests will march on Washington, hoist the red flag of Bolshevism and law defiance in front of the Capitol.

The moral effect will be open defiance of the Government, the flaunting of Bolshevism and revolution, the encouragement of anarchy.

It is a burning insult to the people of Washington and the Nation at large that such a demonstration be permitted to take place, and it is but adding insult to injury to give it the protection of the police.

Law-defying, prohquor element, headed by Samuel Gompers and his ilk.

Most vicious and law-defying element the world has known.

Helping break down law and order that Bolshevism may dominate.

Low element fostered and backed by the liquor interests.

Followers of the outlawed liquor trade.

Radicals, anarchists, Bolshevists, thieves, thugs, gunmen, pro-German sympathizers, and weak-kneed individuals.

The permission to hold this demonstration is an absolute surrender to a disloyal element, masquerading behind the name of "labor" and harboring in its arms the spirit of treason and Bolshevism.

Allowing a direct demonstration against properly enacted law will lend encouragement to all the lawless elements to rise up against the Government, and will imperil the safety of the Nation.

Pro-German element, as treacherous as the crowd across the sea.

Drive them from the country that America may be a fit place in which to live.

We have no place for those who defy our Government.

Connected with this tirade of false, vicious, and unwarranted abuse was a reference to the "Christian ideals" of the people the Clipsheet claims to represent. To men of the character who edit the Clipsheet, Christian ideals are excess baggage. The theories of the Clipsheet have little relation to the mission of the friend of "publicans and sinners." They belong to the ultra-religious class who crucified the Saviour. They belong to the class that stood on the streets and thanked God that they were not as other men. They are the class of whom the Saviour said, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees."

This type of preacher-politician is the same type of men who 30 years ago used the pulpits of America to stir up all the bitter hatreds of the A. P. A. movement.

There is a large California orphan asylum in my district where at that time hundreds of unfortunate and parentless children were cared for by the Catholic Church, in a form of charity of which the world knows no better. In order to provide the orphan asylum with a sufficient supply of water, excavations were made on the top of an adjoining hill on which to place a reservoir. A preacher-politician editing a paper, similar to the Clipsheet, gave out a scare-head report that the Catholics were fortifying the orphanage, preparing for a revolution, when they were going to seek to take over the Government and destroy the Protestants.

Eventually falsehood, uncharitableness, and Phariseeism take their course. Truth, fairness, and common sense will yet prevail.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that if I do not conclude my remarks at the end of 10 minutes, I may be allowed to revise and extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. My friend from Massachusetts—that is to say, from Boston [Mr. FITZGERALD]—said that he wanted Massachusetts to live its own life and not be interfered with by those from other States who desired to legislate upon any subject that might affect them. The people of my State and of the South about 50 years ago wanted to live their own lives. We were the happiest people in the world. We had about 4,000,000 slaves, worth about $2,000,000,000. Many of those slaves we had purchased from the State of Massachusetts, represented, in part, so ably by the gentleman from Boston. These chattels had ceased to be valuable in the northeast as skilled laborers, but they could make cotton, and we bought their ancestors from our enterprising friends in Massachusetts mainly. We wanted to live our own lives and we brought them, largely from New England, down to the sunny South to make cotton. This great Union would not allow us to live our own lives. It took our slaves from us. It not only freed the slaves without compensating our fathers for them, but it did something worth while, it freed the white boys of the South as well. The young white men of the South would not have been worth preserving if slavery had not been abolished. [Applause.]

Now, I had some trouble in my mind about this problem of liquor confiscation for many years. I thought it might be unfair to people such as those represented by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], who owned valuable property in the way of vineyards and distilleries and liquors, to confiscate their property. But when I thought about those 4,000,000 slaves in the South, emancipated with a stroke of the pen as a war measure, I concluded that this furnished a precedent, and that if slavery was a crime such as to justify confiscation, the liquor traffic should be similarly treated. We are now destroying a greater enemy of mankind than slavery. [Applause.]

Liquor is a poison. The saloon is a nuisance. Either the State or National sovereignty has the right to destroy it, as it has to destroy the paraphernalia of a gambling house without compensation to the owners.

I have listened with great interest to the distinguished constitutional lawyers from Ohio and Pennsylvania. Strange to say, they are against this bill because it is not going to be enforceable. They define the word "concurrent." I want to refer to an authority which I think is at least as persuasive as the authorities cited by those constitutional lawyers from Pennsylvania, to wit, Mr. STEELE and Mr. DEWALT. Bouvier's Law Dictionary is recognized as an authority in law all over the world. In defining the word "concurrent" it says:

Concurrent. Running together; having the same authority: thus we say a concurrent consideration occurs in the case of mutual promises; such-and-such courts have concurrent jurisdiction—that is, each has the same jurisdiction.

In my State the circuit court has original jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. The justices' courts have original jurisdiction. They have concurrent jurisdiction, and the court that gets possession of the defendant's body first has jurisdiction to try him for a misdemeanor. So concurrent jurisdiction means, as Bouvier says it does, as when "a concurrent consideration occurs in the case of mutual promises, such-and-such courts have concurrent jurisdiction; that is, each has the same jurisdiction."

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]—and I hesitate to differ with him—refers to authorities here to sustain his position and asserts that it is impossible for any authority to prosecute a man for violating the liquor law under amendment No. 18 if the State does not adopt exactly the same penalty and the same kind of a law that the Federal Government adopts. I do not have any trouble about that at all. We have in each State Federal courts, and we have State courts. If a man violates a State law which provides a penalty of $100 and six months in jail for selling liquor, it can do that. It has concurrent power with the Federal Government to enforce that kind of a statute. The Federal court, if it made the penalty greater or less, different from what the State makes, would have the right to try a defendant also.

We say to the liquor men of the country, "You are shifty; you have plenty of money; you know how to evade the law. We are going to prosecute you in either the Federal or State courts. We are going to give jurisdiction to the State court, for that court to try you and assess any penalty that the State sees fit to impose upon you, and we give the Federal Government the same jurisdiction. So my friend can not escape the conclusion that the State court or the Federal court, either, may try a defendant under amendment 18, no matter if there is a difference in the penalty imposed by any State and the Federal Government, and the Federal Government can try him if his State fails to legislate on this subject.

I fail to see the bearing of the decision read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his point. The case he cited occurred on account of trouble between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin with reference to jurisdiction over a certain stream, the St. Croix River. Here is what that court decided. It does not uphold his contention. It says with reference to that particular case:

The result is that neither of these States—

That is, Minnesota or Wisconsin—

could as against the other rightfully assume or exercise the assumption of permanent occupancy or possession or control of the navigable portion of the river.

That is true. Here was a river running between two States. The law gave those two States concurrent jurisdiction over the stream. The decision states that one State alone could not exercise the right of permanent occupancy of that river. It does not touch the issue here as I see it. So if my position is tenable that objection is disposed of. We have had many amusing things mentioned in this discussion. Gentlemen who want to see this bill defeated, gentlemen who want wine and beer sold, raise the objection that if this bill is passed it will not be enforceable.

Why, our friends from Pennsylvania and Boston should be delighted to see a liquor-enforcement law passed that is not enforcible. These gentlemen want liquors sold, and why should they complain that this bill if passed will be unconstitutional? Whenever a gentleman has no other argument to offer against a proposition, he says it is unconstitutional.

The able and distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] says he has been a prohibitionist all his life, and yet he is against this bill because it is too drastic. I am for it because it is drastic. [Applause.] It has teeth in it. It must be drastic or it will not stop the sale of liquor. The gentleman and others, including my legal friend from Ohio [Mr. GARD], say that they sympathize with the poor old farmer who under this bill can not make cider out of his apples. No; they are not sympathizing with the farmer. They are sympathizing with the bull-necked saloon keepers who are going to be put out of business by the passage of this law. And my friend from North Carolina [Mr. POU] knows an old gentleman who has been driving a public vehicle for 30 years, and he is afraid somebody who gets into that vehicle and takes a drink is going to be arrested. The same gentleman is afraid that old Aunt Jane, who has made a pint of blackberry cordial, is going to be arrested in her home for having liquor in her possession. Such objections as these are calculated to fatigue one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. TILLMAN. The man who has a hundred head of cattle and who does not want to be compelled to put them up when a new fence law is passed is always worried about the trouble the fence law is going to cause the Widow Jones who has one cow. The gentlemen, by talking mere drivel, are pleading the cause of the liquor men. They are pleading the cause of those who for all these years have violated the law. I never knew of a saloon keeper in my life who did not violate the law. He sold on Sunday; he sold to minors. They invariably do it; and it is amusing to observe them shed tears because coca cola will be sold, because moonshiners will operate, because the poor laborer can not get his 3 per cent beer when they are put out of business.

They say also that we are going to become confirmed candy eaters if we quit drinking liquor. Yes; I think you may look for an increase in the sale of candy; father may get full on it; but it is not going to be so bad as it was when he used to go to the barroom and get drunk. You remember that old play of Ten Nights in a Barroom, which, when we were boys, used to bring tears to our eyes. A little girl went to get her father out of the saloon. It was a very touching scene. Now they say father is going to become dissipated by eating candy. Witness a new scene:

FATHER "EATING" AGAIN.

"I fear father's eating again," she says.

"I shall go get him. 'Tis only I can influence him in a time like this," and little Rachael, aged 12, climbs from her chair, and wrapping her wrap about her until her wrap's wrapped enough starts out alone into the dark night.

She reaches the gay city. She pushes by rough men, who turn from her with harsh laughs and flourish candy boxes in her face. She is jostled by the crowds. Bravely she pushes on until she reaches a low candy shop. All is noise and hilarity within. Candy-crazed voices fill the air with vulgar shoutings and tipsy songs. Unafraid, little Rachael enters the door. It isn't the first time. Through the haze of tobacco smoke and behind a pile of empty candy cartons she spies her father.

The rude crowd grows quiet. Men in the act of stuffing another bonbon into their mouths pause and watch the drama about to be enacted. Little Rachael walks to her father, and touching him lightly on the shoulder speaks to him.

"Father, oh, father, you must come with me, the steak's getting stale and so is the tea, the children are wailing, the night's getting old, mother is sobbing and supper is cold. You promised, dear father, you would always abstain, but I see you're still eating; please try to refrain."

Her father, brushing a tear from his reddened eye, throws the half-empty candy box away, and during the scuffle that ensues for the treasured morsels that still remain staggers out with little Rachael into the dark, dark night.

Oh, yes, we are going to be driven to boozing on candy. We are soon also to know the horrors of the buttermilk jag. Father and brother will succumb to the awful lure of cold coffee and iced tea, nut sundaes, death-dealing orangeade, and soul-destroying grape juice. God save the mark, and God save father! [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee; it is sometimes well to outline the consequences which will follow from an interpretation sought to be impressed upon a law under consideration as an aid in determining whether that interpretation should be adopted. I gathered from the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], an argument which was concurred in by other gentlemen who spoke on the same lines, that any act of Congress in the nature of an enforcement act passed pursuant to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution would not be effective in any State until that act was validated by some action of the legislature of that State. I wish to point out one or two remarkable consequences of that interpretation, and to show how utterly they are at variance with anything in our experience. As I have said, if I correctly gathered the attitude of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Congress may pass an enforcement act by virtue of the authority afforded by the eighteenth amendment, and yet this act so passed under the authority of the Constitution, will not be operative as other acts are, throughout the United States, unless and until it is validated, or concurred in by all the 48 States now composing the Union.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Just for a question. I have but little time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Suppose a State passes an enforcement law providing that the penalty for a violation of the act shall be a fine of $1, and the act of Congress as contained in this bill is passed, and in that State a man is indicted and tried under the $1 provision, would that vitiate this act?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. There are two sovereignties which under the eighteenth amendment are vested with equal power to enact statutes of enforcement. The fact that one State may enforce this amendment by a statute differing in some respects from the statute passed by Congress, does not mean that the two statutes will be in conflict. Obviously if a man is indicted under a State statute, prosecuted under a State statute, and convicted under a State statute, he remains entirely under the sovereignty of the State. The Federal statute of enforcement may provide an entirely different punishment. The same act is an offense against separate and distinct sovereignties, and therefore punishable by both.

Mr. CALDWELL. You are putting him twice in jeopardy.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all, the sovereignties are different. The right to plead autrefois acquit, or convict as the case may be, arises when the effort is made to punish a man twice for one offense against a single sovereignty. That is a distinction which apparently has been ignored by the gentleman.

Permit me to continue the illustration I was undertaking to afford. Suppose we should pass the pending enforcement statute. Then according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania it must be concurred in by the States to give it a universal operative force, or by some one State to be effective in that State. New York we will say, ratifies it, Rhode Island declines to ratify, Maryland ratifies, and California declines to ratify. Then upon the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania we would have the remarkable spectacle of an act of Congress that would be operative in New York and not operative in Rhode Island; operative in Maryland, and not operative in California. A law of Congress would be effective only in spots. Is there any parallel to such a situation in the jurisprudence of our country? Was such a conclusion ever reached, as to any other act of Congress?

More than this, by virtue of the interpretation which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is seeking to impose upon the eighteenth amendment, we would give to each and every State in the Union the power to nullify in substance, an act of Congress. Nullification played a considerable part at one time in the politics of this country. But the statesmen maintaining that doctrine, could not make it effective. Is it now solemnly contended that a constitutional amendment should be so construed as to give to the States, as against a Federal statute, an effective power of nullification?

Should Congress act first, and pass a Federal statute, and Virginia, for instance, is opposed to it, then Virginia can nullify that statute as to its territory, by failing to take any action on its part. On the other hand the Congress will have the same power of nullification as to the acts of any State. Should Virginia enact primarily a statute to which Congress was opposed, the failure of Congress to concur in the Virginia statute, would render that statute abortive, even in Virginia. The two distinct sovereignties would be clothed with equally distinctive power over the acts of each other. The spectacle of Congress nullifying a statute of a State by declining to act, and of a State nullifying an act of Congress by a like inaction, is certainly a novel and remarkable one.

There are instances in which a State can not act under the Constitution unless the necessary authority is afforded by Congress, but I do not recall a case in which the power of Congress to pass an act under the authority of the Constitution, may be defeated by the nonaction of a State legislature.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; my time is too limited. Ten minutes is very little time in which to make a legal argument on the question of construing the Constitution. I wish to call the attention of the committee to another proposition. When this House submitted to the States for ratification this eighteenth amendment, that action was taken as the result of a Nation-wide feeling, that in the interests of better citizenship, the liquor traffic should be abolished, and to that end new and effective agencies should be created. It was the fixed purpose of Congress to quicken and enlarge, not reduce and retard the powers of the State, and the Nation to suppress this traffic, by giving both to the States and the Nation a power over the subject matter which respectively these sovereignties had not hitherto enjoyed. The amendment gives Congress the power to deal with offenses in the States, and gives to the States authority to deal with subjects not heretofore confided to them, namely, importations and exportations.

These new powers were afforded for the reason that the overwhelmingly dominant sentiment of the people of this country was determined to wipe out the liquor traffic. Hence the creation of the agencies to make effective this fixed and dominant purpose on the part of the people. [Applause.] And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania would seek to give an interpretation to this amendment which would make it more difficult than at present to prosecute offenses within the States, and as well as offenses of an interstate character. Why do I say this? Because the effect of that interpretation is to take from Congress and the States the power to pass a statute of enforcement, unless the act of one sovereignty is concurred in by the other. Apart from this amendment Congress certainly is empowered to deal with offenses in interstate traffic, but according to the theory of construction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congress would not be able to provide a punishment for parties unlawfully moving intoxicating spirits, in interstate traffic, unless its action was ratified or validated by the action of the State or States. Nor would a State be able to effectively legislate under this amendment against offenses occurring in the State, unless the statute was concurred in by Congress. Hence the construction of the amendment urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if sustained, would weaken the power both of the States and of the Nation to deal with this offending traffic. Can it be conceived upon any view of this amendment, having in mind the circumstances and purpose of its passage, that it was designed in the interests of the liquor traffic, by furnishing less effective agencies than formerly existed to combat and suppress it? An ordinary amendment to the Constitution becomes the law of the land when ratified by three-fourths of the States, but according to the theory of construction which we have been discussing an act of Congress enacted pursuant to this amendment will not become the law of the land, until it is ratified, or concurred in by the 48 States composing the Union. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] put into the RECORD a statement as to the amount of taxes that the Nation would lose if we enforced the prohibitory law. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been reading his own paper, for up in Philadelphia they have already found that under war-time prohibition they have a saving of far more than the loss in tax revenue. I read from the Philadelphia Evening Ledger of July 5, 1919:

DAILY ARRESTS SLUMP FROM 300 TO 45 HERE—PASSING OF LIQUOR FOLLOWED BY EASY DAYS FOR POLICE, EVEN IN TENDERLOIN.

The art of getting arrested is going out of style in this city along with hard liquor.

From a daily average of 300 arrests here prior to July 1, the average has dropped to about 45 since that momentous day.

The oldest "beat pounders" at the Tenth and Buttonwood Streets station and the Eleventh and Winter Streets station could not recall a quieter Fourth of July in their districts.

In the old days the police worked overtime in those districts. Yesterday three arrests were made. One man was befuddled when brought in. He thickly asserted his trouble was not due to near beer. Two youths were brought in for playing craps.

One lone figure faced Magistrate Pennock in central station yesterday. He was arrested for using a wrong license number on his automobile.

The magistrate had come up to this city on an early morning train from Atlantic City. He thought of the wind-swept beach, sighed as he looked at the lonely prisoner, then discharged him. Pennock got the next train back to the seashore.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reading from the same great publication, the Public Ledger, to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] has just referred, I quote from the first page, first column, of this morning's issue:

Poisonous soft drinks undermine children's health.
Saccharine and coal-tar dyes in cheap and dangerous products.
Sale of impure soda breeding tuberculosis.

[Laughter.]

Are made in filthy places and sold under most insanitary conditions.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret I can not yield in two minutes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I would just like to know if the gentleman wrote the article himself?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; not guilty. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting this soda-water article.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Here is the harrowing tale in full:

The congested portion of Philadelphia is slowly but surely having its health undermined by the continued use of soft drinks, soda water, and water ices put up under the most insanitary conditions, which contain ingredients that are forbidden by the law, and cause digestive disorders in the drinker, and which are finally dispensed from fountains or carts, where no precautions to protect the public health are taken.

Tuberculosis, intestinal and stomach disorders are on the increase as the result of the extensive use of the drinks, due to a combination of prohibition and hot weather. Medical authorities yesterday agreed on this point when queried by a Public Ledger reporter and denounced the cheap "pop" as "poison."

The drinks, which are composed of the cheapest possible ingredients, are sold at a very low price because of their poor quality and are consumed in large quantities by the families in the congested sections.

Unaware of the harmful effects of certain substitutes used in making the drinks, the parents of large families send their children to the fountains to have pitchers filled with the soda water, which is cooling if nothing else, and then doled out portions of the drinks to infants, only to have them writhing in pain a short time later as the coal tar or saccharine used in the soda water took effect on the children.

Many of the families are unable to procure ice and turn to the soda water for relief for their sweltering families. In many cases the soda water is the drink of the supper table, and in this way, doctors agree, the many summer disorders that at times mount up to alarming proportions, especially among the children, have their inception.

SACCHARINE MUCH TO BLAME.

The saccharine used in sweetening the drinks, although forbidden by law, and the coal-tar flavoring and coloring, used in drinks sold as pure, are the two ingredients that are causing a large portion of the trouble that is keeping the doctors in the congested portions busy. In these districts every corner store has a fountain, where the cheap drinks are handed over the counters under conditions that are almost unbelievable.

The use of the saccharine, surreptitiously used in some cases by the manufacturers of the soft drinks, is prohibited by law, and is known as a poison which causes violent digestive troubles. Doctors prescribe it sometimes for treatment of diabetes. The coal-tar derivatives also are attacked by the physicians as causing stomach troubles, while the continued use of it, even in the soda water, is likely to cause heart disease in the drinker.

Thousands of bottles of the flavoring and pop are made daily by the soda manufacturers. In many cases the plants are located in narrow and dirty streets. In one case, it is charged, the soda-water bottling establishment is located in a stable, and here the pop is poured into the bottles. Flies play about the bottles, while in other cases the premises of the bottling places are frequented by many mongrels who poke their snouts into the bottles of soda.

IS GATHERER OF FLIES.

The flavors of soda are then taken to the retailer, who, in most cases, is in a corner cigar store, with the soda fountain open to the street end, exposed to the dirt and dust caused by passing traffic. The soda fountain, with its sweet stickiness, is always a playground for swarms of flies. The washing of the glasses is perfunctory at the best, a mere rinsing that accomplishes nothing, and this in a vicinity where the doctors declare that the proportion of tuberculosis among the residents is higher than any other section of the city. Indeed, many of the proprietors of the soda fountains are suspected of having communicable diseases by at least one physician who has a large practice in the congested sections.

The physicians say that tuberculosis in many cases is transmitted by the unwashed glasses that are used in many places, and that children are thus given the dread white plague. Due to the poor housing and sanitation conditions, the percentage of tuberculosis in the congested sections, both downtown and uptown, is said to be amazing, and sick and healthy intermingle as they drink from the common glass at the corner soda-water fountain.

Dr. M. Jacob, of Fifth Street, near Reed, who is connected with the Phipps Institute and the Eaglesville Sanitarium, was especially bitter in his denunciation of the evils. He declared that he warned his patients against the soda water and the water ices that are known as "snowballs and are sold from pushcarts to thirsty and sweltering children."

Dr. Jacob said that if the users could but see the conditions under which the flavors and soda are made they would never again use the cooling drinks. He said that his experience in the congested districts had convinced him that a goodly portion of the disorders among the children there were due to the continued and daily use of the cheap soda waters.

KNOW THEIR STUFF IS BAD.

He said the makers of the stuff had frankly said the soda and flavors they were using were little better "than garbage," but said they could not do any better at the price they were selling their stuff.

"Every hot spell has its resultant effect on the number of patients that we doctors have. It is rotten stuff that is being forced down the throats of the poor and ignorant people of this district who can not afford to buy a cake of ice daily, and something ought to be done to stop it. The very men who sell it are ofttimes afflicted with some disorders that are easily transmitted by carelessness to the buyer of the soda water or water ice." Dr. Jacob also declared that much of the trouble was caused by the terrible conditions under which the drinks are sold to the masses of the people in the downtown section, as well as the poor stuff used in making the drinks.

Dr. A. A. Cairns, chief medical inspector of the city force, said that while he was aware of the conditions under which the adulterated soda water was being made and sold, nevertheless he personally could do nothing to check it. He said he had heard of an establishment where the soda was bottled and the flavors made in the very place where the horses were stabled, but that the only manner in which anything could be done would be for the place to be closed as a menace to the public health. When asked why this was not done, Dr. Cairns said that he did not know, as another department was concerned in the matter.

He also told of the deleterious effects of drinking the adulterated soda.

HELPS WEAKEN SYSTEM.

Physicians at Mount Sinai Hospital said that while they suspected that the soda water, pop, and water ice were responsible for a portion of the cases brought into them, nevertheless they had never made an exhaustice research into the matter. Other physicians said the soda weakened the system of the drinkers so they were more susceptible to disease.

Robert M. Simmers, State food inspector, when queried by the Public Ledger, told of the horrible conditions under which the soda and flavors are prepared. "Many of the places are unfit for a pig or dog," he said. Mr. Simmers characterized the product of some of the pop manufacturers as little better than "so much poison." He said he had found a large portion of the intestinal disorders were caused by the soda.

Large placards have been distributed by the State in several languages, which warn that the use of saccharine in the drinks is poisonous.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use a portion of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read if no one is to take the floor.

Mr. DYER. I think it would be a good thing, as I think we have heard enough argument.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, so many attorneys, some lawyers of such great eminence, have given us the benefit of their opinions on the legal construction of this proposed measure that I hesitate to express my humble ideas concerning same. There has been such a diversity of opinion, however, that I am made bold in voicing a few conclusions.

The distinguished authority on constitutional law, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], would have us to believe that because section 2 of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides—that before the Federal enforcement act would be enforceable in any State such State would have to ratify or pass a statute similar to the act of Congress. With all due respect to this distinguished gentleman, and to others of my colleagues who seem to agree with him, and for whose legal opinion ordinarily, and upon a subject not so partisan as the one under discussion I would have the highest regard, to me such a construction appears absolutely ridiculous.

The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation—

The legal definition of "concurrent," as given by Mr. Bouvier and Mr. Black in their respective law dictionaries, has already been placed before the House. It so happens that in practically every State in the Union there is concurrent jurisdiction given to various courts and exercised by all of them at one and the same time. Concurrent power is synonymous with concurrent jurisdiction. Our Federal district court enjoys concurrent jurisdiction and power with our State circuit courts to try naturalization cases conferring the rights of citizenship upon foreign-born citizens. One has just as much power, authority, and jurisdiction as the other, though each acting with the same purpose.

While on the circuit bench in the State of Texas I had much experience in trying defendants charged with violating the prohibition statutes passed by the legislature. Under the State law constituting it a felony to make one sale of liquor, I have sentenced men to the penitentiary, who, while violating a State law making their offense a felony, were yet amenable to the United States court only under a misdemeanor charge with a fine as the punishment. And in one such case I remember—The State of Texas against Taylor Avant—the defendant had displayed upon the wall of his restaurant a Federal license which authorized him to sell intoxicating liquor.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Thus we see that a defendant, through the commission of a single act, may violate a State law, be guilty of a crime against a State, and be subject to one penalty, and yet at the same time by the same act violate a Federal law against the United States Government and be guilty of an entirely different offense and be subject to an entirely different punishment.

If I may presume to answer the great constitutional lawyer from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], whose judgment and advice we would all love to be able to follow, let us say that Pennsylvania does not pass an enforcement statute after this bill becomes a law, and one should thereafter sell intoxicating liquor in Pennsylvania, he would be tried under the Federal law by the United States court and punished according to the punishment we provide in this bill. He would not and could not be tried by a State court, because there would be no State law that he had violated. Suppose Pennsylvania should prescribe a nominal fine as the punishment for violating this law, then such culprit could be tried by the State court and punished by a nominal fine, and then also tried by the United States court and punished according to the provisions of this bill. There would be no placing in jeopardy twice for the same offense, because, as stated by the eminent gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], there would be two entirely different sovereignties whose different laws making such act different crimes of which in violation thereof the defendant was guilty. There would be the Federal sovereignty with its law, its crime, and its penalty, and at the same time, on the other hand, there would be the State sovereignty with its law, its crime, and its penalty, both concurrent, and yet exercised by each separately; and the bootleggers heretofore plying their infamous and dastardly vocations in the various States will be put upon notice by this act that hereafter they will be answerable both to Uncle Sam's unerring courts, with unerring punishment, and also to the State courts. In cases tried by me I remember incidents where the defendant had taken out his Federal license by paying his tax, which eliminated that feature from his prosecution in the United States court, yet, as before stated, was guilty of a felony in the State court. This section 2 of the eighteenth amendment merely gives to each State the right it already possessed to constitute liquor selling a crime against the sovereignty of that State and the authority to punish the offender by State law, but this is entirely distinct and additional to the right and power lawfully delegated to Congress by the people of the United States through the said eighteenth amendment, to create Federal machinery such as the now proposed law to enforce such provision in the Federal courts throughout this Nation.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, as a judge from the State of Texas, where he finds any law that ever authorized the United States to issue a license to sell liquor. The gentleman said a while ago that a license was posted in a restaurant in Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it was so posted.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They do not issue a license. They merely collect a tax.

Mr. YATES. They issue a stamp.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They issue a receipt for the tax.

Mr. BLANTON. The receipt for the tax is the document to which I referred as a license.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is not construed as a license.

Mr. BLANTON. But I referred to it as a license.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is merely a tax. It is a receipt for a tax. That is all the Federal authorities give a liquor dealer. They do not give him a license.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Mr. YATES. I wanted to help the gentleman.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman can not do it in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] is getting facetious in drawing a legal distinction between tweedledee and tweedledum. When in local-option territory in Texas a shrewd bootlegger goes to a Government agent and pays his Federal occupation tax to sell intoxicating liquor and hangs his tax receipt up in his place of business, we officers of the law in Texas denominate such document as a license to violate the law by selling intoxicating liquor in local-option territory.

Oh, my anti friends, my good wet friends say that we have no power or authority to prescribe the essential elements and ingredients constituting this offense; that we can not define intoxicating liquor; but that we must leave this question to each separate court of the land for his separate individual judicial ascertainment. Why, just as there is a great diversity of legal opinon here among the lawyer Members of this Congress, so you will probably find fully as great diversity of opinion among the various courts of the country. You would have one judge in New York holding that 2¾ per cent is nonintoxicating, another judge in Florida holding that 2¼ per cent is nonintoxicating, another in California holding that 2 per cent is not intoxicating, while in Chicago or in St. Louis some judge might hold that 4½ per cent, of which I am told the best beer contains, is not intoxicating. And the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution would be worthless.

Why, in every State the essential ingredients of murder are either defined or understood from the common law. The law in defining murder does not stop when it says that every person with sound memory and discretion who with malice aforethought, either express or implied, with a deadly weapon shall take the life of any reasonable creature within being within such State shall be deemed guilty of murder, but it defines what shall constitute malice aforethought, what shall constitute sound memory and discretion, what shall constitute a deadly weapon, and what shall constitute a reasonable creature within being. None of these essential elements are left to the courts to be separately defined according to their diversity of opinion. And so with every crime the elements and essential ingredients are defined by the legislative bodies and not left to the courts. If our law and the judgments of our courts are to be uniform, we must give some guide to the courts by properly defining just exactly what shall constitute crime.

This subject of prohibition has always been fought with both ridicule and astute, ingenious argument. Illustrating these two weapons, I call your attention to the remarks of our genial friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. When have you heard anything more ridiculous upon a serious subject of national importance? And then consider the unusually skillful argument of our honored friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], and you have the ingenious obstacle always to be found in the pathway of prohibition reform. Ridicule and ingenuity.

The wise framers of our Constitution, whom even the opponents of prohibition and this measure still love, admire, cherish, and fondly allude to on all occasions, saw fit to provide a method for amending these cardinal principles of government, and provided that such Constitution could be amended whenever by a two-thirds vote both Houses of Congress submitted the proposed amendment to the people for ratification, and further provided that one of the two methods only of ratifying was the affirmative action taken by the two Houses of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States forming the Union. And the ratification of every single amendment to our Constitution up to this good date has been had through this method—action by the legislatures.

Now, with respect to this eighteenth amendment, the provisions of the Constitution have been followed to the letter. This amendment was passed by this House and the Senate by a two-thirds vote of each branch of Congress, and not merely 36 States, the three-fourths required, but 9 States more than necessary, to wit, 45 States out of the 48 have promptly ratified this amendment, and it has become a part of the fundamental law of the land. Where each of us have sworn to uphold and defend this Constitution, is not it our solemn duty to diligently and vigorously enforce this eighteenth amendment as well as every other portion or subdivision of it, regardless of whether we are pros or antis on the subject of prohibition?

In the march upon our Capitol on our sacred Flag Day, in demanding of Congress that we repeal this law, Mr. Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, and in the name of labor, took the position that Congress has no more right to take from the thousands of foreigners he represents their beer and wine than it has to tell them that they can eat no meat. Such argument! And he intimates that unless Congress complied with his demand and repealed this law there would be anarchy and Bolshevism among the laborers of this country. Why, when a man eats meat it produces no effect upon him that causes him to injure his neighbor or to kill passing strangers. It produces no injurious effects upon his unborn posterity. It does not cause his wife to leave and divorce him. It may cause his stomach to ache, but it does not give the stomach-ache to anybody else. It does not cause him to be tried for murder or some other heinous crime committed under its influence, for meat has no influence whatever upon the mind. It builds up rather than breaks down the physical system. Therefore Congress has no right to say to a man "Thou shalt not eat meat," and no legislative body ever has or ever will attempt to say it.

But when a man drinks intoxicating liquor the injury thereof is not confined to himself or even to his own family. Besides his wife and children suffering from drunken abuse, assaults, injuries, hunger, deprivations, and disgrace, they and every other person who comes in contact with the drinker while under the influence of liquor is in constant danger of life and bodily harm in degree according to the disposition and character of the poor unfortunate so afflicted. His unborn children suffer even unto the third and fourth generation. Should not the president of the great American Federation of Labor be able to draw a distinction between the Government's power of control over the eating of harmless meat and the drinking of harmful intoxicating liquor, sometimes much more harmful to innocent bystanders soberly attending to their own private business than to the drunkard who without warning and without malice causes them to lose their lives?

There was a time when only preachers and good women espoused the cause of prohibition. There was a time when public men dared not favor it or speak in its behalf. There was a time when the traveling men of the country, commonly denominated "drummers," were dissipated. But no finer bunch of sober men can now be found throughout the land. They realized that they could not successfully hold their jobs in honest competition, and they met the problem like men. There was a time when bankers dissipated. But they finally realized that if they expected to retain and increase the confidence of the public they must be sober. There was a time when railroad men were dissipated. But gradually system after system required absolute sobriety, until now few of the splendid men who fill the engine cabs, into whose hands are daily placed the lives and safety of our loved ones, drink at all, but are absolutely sober. They demand it in their organizations. There was a time when lawyers, doctors, and even preachers could drink to excess and still hold the confidence of their clients and patrons, but that day has passed. Men of business demand sober attorneys; anxious fathers and mothers demand sober doctors and surgeons; congregations, even though some may imbibe themselves, demand of their spiritual leaders in the pulpits absolute sobriety. The drinking mechanic can not compete with his sober competitor.

There was a time when public officeholders could drink and remain in office. This is impossible now, with very few exceptions. Gradually the drinking men have been supplanted by men of sober habits.

Intoxicating liquor is not outlawed by the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Association merely. It is outlawed by the healthy public sentiment of the great, tremendous, overwhelming majority of the good men and good women in every walk of life throughout this broad land of ours. The consensus of opinion has been reached that the United States can get along without intoxicating liquor and that our citizens one and all will be much better off without it in the future.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; my time is short.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman recalls the Apostle Paul's position on that subject.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; that excuse is so old and threadbare that I have not time to waste on it. These subterfuges and these excuses——

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Apostle Paul was guilty of a subterfuge?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi is too brilliant a lawyer not to know what I meant. "A little is good for my stomach's sake" has been the subterfuge and excuse of more good men making beasts of their lives and going to the dogs than anything else. They all hide behind Saint Paul. I want to say to my good friend from Mississippi that during my eight years on the circuit bench of Texas my court reporter kept a record of the evidence in all divorce and criminal cases tried, and that record discloses that in 75 per cent of all of the divorce cases tried during those eight years—and there were several hundred—whisky was apparent as the primary cause of the separation; that it was liquor that caused little innocent children to be taken from one parent and given to the other; and such records further disclose that in the hundreds of criminal cases tried before me during those eight years whisky was apparent as the primary cause in at least 85 per cent of them.

Some of our "wet" friends have intimated that prohibition is the fanatic result of the action of new converts. Such is not the case. It is the natural, inevitable result of healthy growth brought about through the educational influence of the pulpit, the incomparable Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League, and the sober, intelligent judgment of the thinking men and women of America.

I have been a strong prohibitionist for 30 years, actively engaged in a continuous effort to help destroy this infamous traffic in human lives and human souls. I have helped to dry many counties in my own State. I have made many speeches there for State-wide prohibition. Both in the Sixty-fifth as well as this Sixty-sixth Congress I have introduced numerous prohibition measures embracing every provision contained in the eighteenth amendment, the war-time prohibition act, and this proposed enforcement act now under consideration, and even more drastic provisions. I do not want to see a single loophole left for this law to be evaded or violated with impunity. Prohibition was an important plank in every platform upon which I have stood in asking my people for public office. It is a platform upon which I am neither afraid nor ashamed to stand. I am one of the happiest and proudest Members of this Congress to have been instrumental in helping to bring about national prohibition laws that will make every State in this Union as dry as a bone. Our friends need not be so apprehensive of nonenforcement of this law. Bootleggers will not be dealing with State courts altogether. They are to face the Federal courts of our land, where it is possible to enforce the law and where punishment is certain. It is the certainty of punishment that deters crime, and my experience has been that while criminals will take many chances with the slow process and uncertain action and inadequate procedure of our State courts, they are not willing to monkey with any of Uncle Sam's courts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FESS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I have seen so much excitement in this House and throughout the country upon this question that I am going to make as brief and dispassionate a statement as I can of some of my views on this bill. I am tired of speeches fit only for the hustings in this House. I am no new convert to the advocacy of temperance in the United States. For 22 years I have stood upon this floor and supported that cause. There has never been passed in this Congress during that period a single law that has not been voted for by me.

Mr. Chairman, it will hardly be possible for me to discuss this measure except in a few of its features during the time allotted to me.

I regret very much that the enactment proposed to enforce the provisions of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, which prohibits the manufacture and sale of liquor, should come in this unusual, unnecessary, and drastic form. We all accept the doctrine that liberty is not license, but the right of every man to do that which he wants to do in obedience to just laws. A law which is not just is destructive of liberty. In the interest of society and for the establishment of a government under a constitution the individual must surrender many of those rights which belong to him by nature to the State in which he resides, and under our dual system of government it was essential that many rights of the States should be yielded to the General Government for the benefit and protection of all.

There has never been a system of government like ours, perhaps none so complex in its nature and yet so efficient in preserving local and national rights. The powers of the State and Federal Governments are in the main distinct. The Federal Government is supreme where authority is delegated to it under the Constitution. It is a Government of delegated powers only. The State exercises all those sovereign powers that have not been delegated to the Federal Government or prohibited to it by the Federal Constitution, yet there are some powers that the State and Federal Government may exercise concurrently, with the result that an individual may be punished for one and the same crime by two distinct jurisdictions. The States may prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor, as may the United States. The Federal Government has no power to legislate on any subject unless that power is granted in the Constitution, but it may exercise any powers that can be fairly implied from the special power granted to enforce it, and it may invoke other provisions of the Constitution to enforce a provision of that instrument, but it can not go lawfully beyond this. Congress can not imply by its arbitrary will a power from an express power granted to it that is not essential to enforce the expressed power, nor can it imply an unconstitutional power and exercise it for that purpose.

The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. Any legislation that will be necessary and reasonable to carry out or enforce this provision may be invoked by Congress, but this essential legislation must be fairly implied and directed to the prevention of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. It can not be directed against other and distinct offenses. It is perhaps lawful through the commerce clause of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, to prohibit the transportation, exportation, and importation of intoxicating liquors, but that power, I think, would be of doubtful implication from the eighteenth amendment. However, when taking the commerce clause of the Constitution and connecting it with the eighteenth amendment, this bill is clearly constitutional, so far as it prevents the manufacture and sale or transportation of liquors in interstate commerce, but it is very questionable that transportation could be prohibited under any provision of the Constitution in mere intrastate commerce, because Congress has no jurisdiction over intrastate commerce. However the courts might hold about this it seems certain that the language in page 3, section 7, that makes it unlawful for any person to "receive or possess" any intoxicating liquor is unconstitutional, because no such authority is given in the amendment, nor can it, under any sensible rule of construction, be fairly implied from the amendment or any section of the Constitution, since the mere possession of liquor by an individual not engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor is not a necessary means of preventing the manufacture and sale of liquor. If the words "receive or possess" apply only to those who manufacture and sell, it might be held to be a fair implication from the Constitution, but it goes beyond this and applies to any individual who has any intoxicating liquor in his possession. Then, too, the word "possess" in this connection means that the liquor can not be used, as it would be impossible to use it without possession. It certainly is not necessary to prevent one from using liquor in order to enforce prohibition against the manufacture and sale of liquor. If that had been intended, the words "manufacture and sale" need not have been put in the bill. It would have been only necessary to say it shall be unlawful for one to possess or use liquor. Thus is precluded the possibility of an intelligent implication of power to prevent possession and use of intoxicating liquors under the Constitution. The power, however, is ample to prevent the manufacture and sale. It would seem unnecessary to any intelligent mind to contend that when the power of Congress is limited alone to a prevention of the manufacture and sale of liquor that it would have the implied power to prevent the possession and therefore the use of it by one in no way connected with the manufacture and sale of it. Congress can not imply a power from a power granted and do an unconstitutional thing even in support of the Constitution itself. The means of enforcing and making effective a constitutional amendment must be essentially constitutional; else it is not a fair implication of power from a particular grant of legislative authority.

I think the section of the bill referred to is unconstitutional in the respect mentioned.

Again, the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prevents the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. The question of what "intoxicating liquor" is, within the meaning of this constitutional amendment, must be determined from the usually accepted meaning of these words at the time of the adoption of the amendment. It is a judicial question, one for the courts and not one for the legislative branch of the Government. If Congress can define what "intoxicating liquor" means and determine that any brand of whisky, wine, beer, porter, or ale is intoxicating that contains one-half of 1 per cent alcohol the next Congress, having a similar power, can determine that any beverage containing 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 90 per cent of alcohol would or would not be intoxicating, as no Congress has a right to bind upon matters of legislation a subsequent Congress. The meaning of the fundamental law would thus vary from time to time and would be subject to the caprice and will of a partisan Congress. Congress can not change the meaning of a constitutional power by statute nor add to nor take from it by the use of any words defining what it means. The amendment is self-explanatory. If not, it would be nugatory. The words "intoxicating liquor" must have a fixed and determined judicial significance in the view and light of the meaning of those words at the time of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, else Congress by statute would be constantly changing and making constitutional provisions on the subject. The fundamental law must be stable and fixed; that it should be so was the purpose of passing the amendment. Constitutional law does not vary like statutes. The facts in each and every case when applied to the law will determine whether the law has been violated or not. The facts as to the component parts of a beverage must be known and its effect on the system determined in order to show whether or not it is an intoxicating liquor. If Congress could at will name anything that it desired to as an intoxicating liquor and prohibit the use of it under this section, it might name sulphur water, ginger ale, or anything else it wanted to as intoxicating liquor, and punish for the manufacture and sale. The question as to whether the beverage is intoxicating or not, as I have stated, is purely one of fact under the law. Some beer, some ale, some porter might be intoxicating or not with more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol in it. In fact, it has been judicially determined in the State of New York that beer with 2.75 per cent of alcohol is nonintoxicating. Certainly beer with 1 per cent of alcohol would be nonintoxicating. Can Congress arbitrarily say that beer with one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating when the fact is not so? If so, then it holds that a nonintoxicating beverage is intoxicating and penalizes the manufacture and sale of it when it only has power to prevent the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes. I would rather not, but I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I just wanted to ask the gentleman a question in that connection. It has been stated here by a gentleman representing the very moral city of Pittsburgh that the brewers are now making 2¾ per cent beer, and that the saloons are calling for it; that the courts have nothing to do. Do you not think that Judge Sweeney, who is asleep on the job with nothing to do, could testify that beer is not intoxicating?

Mr. MOON. I do not know how that is. I am discussing a question of fact and a question of law, and how the proper decision must be reached in any case under the facts and the law.

This is so evidently a question of fact, to be determined by judicial decision, that it seems mental weakness to discuss it. [Applause.]

Gentlemen are in error when they say that in the States the legislature determines what is alcoholic liquor. Under the statutes prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, where liquor, beer, and wine is alleged to be sold in violation of law, it must be proven as a fact on trial of a case that the beer or wine is sufficiently alcoholic to produce intoxication. The State, with its plenary police power, might prohibit sale of any kind of liquor, whether alcoholic or malt, but when the statutes, as does the eighteenth amendment, prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor only, the question would be a judicial one and for the courts only. The terms of the Federal amendment limit the power of Congress, and we can not go beyond. Of course, we do not know what the courts may hold, but this objection seems clear to me. We must do our own duty regardless of what the courts, the Senate, or President may do in this matter. Under our oaths of office we alone are the judges as to the meaning of the Constitution, the test of which we are sworn to apply to all measures we vote upon. If we think the measure is unconstitutional, we violate our oaths of office if we support it.

I would be glad to discuss the constitutional features of this bill in some other respects, but I am without time. However, there are other objections to the bill which I desire to mention. The bill is unusual and unreasonable in that it attempts in so many particulars to reverse the ordinary and well-established rules of evidence in the trials in courts of questions arising under this amendment. It can hardly be said that any sane reason could be given why the whole method of judicial procedure, as well as the burden of proof, should be shifted in order to enforce this amendment. Why can not it be enforced just as any other law?

Under the law to-day in any case of murder, arson, larceny, or burglary the burden of proof is upon the State or the United States, as the case may be, to establish the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. Under the provisions of this bill, when a man is accused under certain conditions, the whole burden of proof is shifted to the defendant, and he must establish his innocence. No civilized State ever tolerated such a law. Again, a number of men who are entirely innocent of wrongdoing may by reason of the wrongdoing of others be convicted and forced to pay enormous fines and costs provided for in this bill. All it is necessary to do to convict the owner of land under the provisions of this bill is to prove that some one has distilled liquor on his land and that he knows or should have known that the offense is being committed, and the burden of proof is upon him. Men frequently own land in the mountains where liquors are unlawfully distilled that are hundreds of miles from their residences. This bill would practically require a man to keep a guard over the land all the time and see that no offense is committed upon it. You might just as well make a man guilty of murder because a man on his land kills some one when the killing would not have occurred had he guarded the land. Again, if any wagon, ship, or railway car should carry any liquor that was unlawfully placed in it by anyone under conditions that one by reasonable care might have known what it contained, that one becomes a prima facie criminal, and he must establish his innocence or his property must be confiscated and sold to pay the costs and penalties. This is making the owners of every means of transportation and of land criminals without having committed an offense.

It is provided in another place that where a man is convicted of a violation of this law, notwithstanding that he may be punished by fines or imprisonment, he shall be required to give bond and security of from $500 to $5,000 in court not to commit that offense again within 12 months under any condition. If he is too poor to give the bond, or fails to give it, he is punished by imprisonment until he does give the bond, not exceeding six months. He is thus punished in advance for an offense that has not been committed at all. No one ever suggested the punishment of a man in advance for an offense that had not been committed until these distinguished apostles of Nero presented this measure.

Under the provisions of this bill, a man can not secure liquor for medicinal purposes without going through formulas that make it almost impossible. If a sick man needing stimulation could not reach a doctor his friend could not give him a drink of liquor without going to prison as a result. If a farmer should permit a keg of sweet cider to ferment and contain more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol and did not throw it away immediately on knowledge thereof he would have to pay fines or have to go to the jail and probably lose his farm, or if a barrel of vinegar, perchance, should by any reason become alcoholic to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent, as sometimes happens, it would have to be disposed of at once, because after it was known by its owner that it contained one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, or if he could have reasonably known it, he would become liable to fine and imprisonment if he retained it.

I might mention a number of things equally objectionable in this bill, because it is a code of laws in itself, as impracticable and senseless as anything ever suggested. We surely ought not to be laying traps for the unwary and ignorant, as well as for the better informed, by which they may be deprived of their liberty or property for doing an act which everyone would recognize in itself as not criminal or in any sense involving moral turpitude.

This bill should be opposed because it is worse in all its features than the infamous force bill. It would take an army of marshals, deputies, and police, annoying and disturbing the people in every section of the country, breaking open and searching houses—except those exclusively used for dwellings—entering boarding houses, hotels, banks, public offices, and private offices everywhere in quest of offenders and suspected violators of the law, whether they have any right or reason to believe that an offense has been committed. Why is it necessary that such strict measures should be undertaken to prevent a man from taking a drink of beer when no such safeguards are thrown around society to protect it from murderers, thieves, and burglars? Is it the work of unreasonable and thoughtless men, or is it the production of men of calm and judicial minds seeking to protect the rights and justly enforce the constitutional amendment?

In this country there are millions of people who regard the eighteenth amendment as a deprivation of liberty. There are millions more who think that this fundamental law is necessary to preserve the race, particularly the youth of the land, from moral and physical destruction. While I have greatly doubted the wisdom of sumptuary laws, for their tendency is to the destruction of free institutions, still I have felt it best to listen to and heed the voices of those who would preserve the morals, health, and good citizenship of the youth of the land by enactments that would save them as well as law can do so from the ravages of alcoholic beverages.

I have therefore voted for every temperance law that has been passed by Congress in the last 22 years, including the eighteenth amendment, and I am anxious to support any just and reasonable and constitutional statute to enforce this amendment against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors by penalties that will accomplish that purpose. A law that is too lax on this subject would be of but little good and would hardly be necessary to pass. One that is cruel and inhuman will do less good, for it will produce a revulsion of sentiment on the subject of the amendment. Conservative laws alone are worthy of a great people. Can we not amend this bill by striking out the unreasonable and unjust features that it contains and make a dignified and effective statute that will be a monument to our sense of justice and right and to the Nation's morality and not an evidence of frenzied folly and unbridled fanaticism? It was the good, law-abiding, and Christian people of this country who forced the passage of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. It was not the professional, political poltroon, who made temperance advocacy a means of securing money as a prime object, that secured the amendment.

That mercy, that justice, and that love of humanity that actuated these good people must ultimately manifest itself again in forcing a modification of this lawless and drastic statute—if you pass it—to meet the necessary and legitimate purposes of the amendment. Standing, I trust, with them, I stand against all who would thus desecrate and degrade the work they have done. My oath of office to support the Constitution, my sense of common justice, my views of my duty to society, will forbid that I vote for this bill in its present shape. If you do not amend it so as to make a just and effective response to the prohibition amendment in spirit and in fact, I shall vote against it, if that will do any good, or I will enter my silent protest to this wild legislation, based on the statement I have made, by not voting at all. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one day in a Georgia court room the great Ben Hill, so long the eloquent tribune of the South, was trying a case, and in rising to address the jury he said:

> May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury, I feel oppressed on this occasion. Whenever I am called upon to do anything for which I see no earthly use, I must regard it in the light of an oppression.

It was the great lawyer-statesman's ingenious way of seeking to impress the jury from the very outset that his case was so plain, the evidence so unmistakable, that he saw no necessity for argument. The case of the people against the liquor traffic and in favor of this law-enforcement bill is likewise plain. I feel a sense of oppression in the very necessity of combating the opposition to this bill. I do not mean that there are not certain features of the bill that may need a slight amendment. I am speaking of the opposition to the bill as a general proposition. It seems to me that whatever a man's personal opinion may have been, either for or against the prohibition of the liquor traffic, he should now take the magnificent stand of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL], who in the beginning of this debate reminded the House that he had always opposed prohibition as a principle, but that now since the friends of national constitutional prohibition had gone out into the open into a free, fair fight and had won an overwhelming victory through the proper channels of legislative enactment, he was determined to stand for vigorous enforcement legislation, devoutly hoping that the law will mean all that its friends claim for it in promoting sobriety and civic righteousness among the people of the Nation. That is splendid Kentucky sportsmanship—yea, more, that is loyal Americanism. [Applause.]

It would make me very happy, because of what I conceive to be the triumph of right; it would make me very proud, as an American citizen, if I could see on the floor of this House the same thing, in spirit, that occurred in the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Legislature on the vote in favor of State-wide prohibition. It was my privilege and honor to address the legislature of that great State just before they cast the vote that banished barrooms forever from their borders. I made the appeal that the "wet" men, who had long defied the will of the known majority, should give the women and the children, the schools, and the churches the benefit of the doubt. I reminded them, as I remind you, gentlemen of the opposition, that this bill is going to pass, and I urged that no man should allow his own children, searching amid the archives of Mississippi history, to find the name of their father recorded opposite a liquor vote; and I rejoiced to learn, when the vote was cast, that the house of representatives voted 110 "dry," and not a single vote in the house in favor of continuing saloons, and only 4 votes in the Senate. Gentlemen of the American Congress, would it not be glorious news to send out to the world, and a glorious legacy to transmit to your children, that, after the friends of sobriety and righteousness have bravely and with clean hands made this eighteenth amendment a part of the Constitution, not one single man was found beneath the dome of the Capitol to oppose the vigorous and complete enforcement of this law?

But before I go into the discussion of any features of the bill itself I wish to clear away a few brush left in my path by the little "brush" that took place on the floor of the House the other day between the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the genial and festive gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], and the gentleman from Georgia.

At the close of his three-minute speech, when I had no time in his time or my time to properly reply, the gentleman from New York, in the spirit of playful repartee, referred to moonshiners in the mountains of Georgia and Kentucky and suggested that "the gentleman from Georgia was evidently an authority on moonshiners." Of course, we all understood the spirit of raillery in which the gentleman spoke, but I remind both him and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] that they began the thrust and they must not complain if I answer in kind. An Irish washwoman saw her little boy Mike vigorously scratching his head, and she yelled at him, "Mike, Mike, stop scratching your head!" And Mike replied in tearful tones, "I won't do it, Ma'am; they commenced on me fust." Parenthetically, I really believe that Mike had a right to scratch; but the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Massachusetts, who believe in "personal liberty" and "regulation" would contend that Mike's tormentor ought to be brought in from the residential districts, put on some special preserve along the crowded marts of trade, in the full enjoyment of police protection, and thereby allowed to continue his torment and devilment in the full exercise of personal liberty. Mike believed not in regulation but in extermination, and Mike was right.

Both of these gentlemen began on me first, and I am tempted to here and now declare, in all good humor, that it is a good thing that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] recently sacrificed his wonderful shock of princely Italo-American hair, because I am thus relieved of the necessity of perpetrating a cross between a comedy and a tragedy by "snatching him baldheaded" [laughter] for his "moonshine" suggestion; and, as to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], there simply "ain't any to snatch."

I do not deny that there may be here and there a moonshine distillery in the mountains of north Georgia—the Kentucky Congressmen are able to take care of the charge against their own lordly mountains. I deprecate their presence, although they are found few and far between, but I place them along with certain other overt violations of law—the law against theft and gambling and murder—but no man would think of repealing the law against these crimes or licensing for any amount of money the perpetrators of these crimes. And these "blind-tiger" distilleries are simply the fruitage of the appetites left to us as a legacy by the long tenure of the liquor traffic. When Baltimore, New York, Boston, and Chicago, the great "wet" centers, shall cease to violate the virtue of "dry" territory by shipping liquor into my own State and all of the States that have voted to be free, it will be far easier to ferret out and destroy the moonshine distilleries of which this gentleman complained.

Interesting indeed to submit right here is the following letter from Baltimore:

BALTIMORE, MD., July 10, 1919.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. UPSHAW: Am greatly enjoying the debate on the prohibition-enforcement question as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am confident you will "tell them a few things" when your turn comes.

Be sure to remind "the gentleman from New York" that the Government's statistics will show that there is more "moonshining" carried on in New York City than in the mountains of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia combined. You can get the figures from the Internal Revenue Department.

Good luck, and may God bless you in your fearless fight for the right.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. F. WILLIAMS.

But, after all, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not think it is much more harm for a Georgia mountaineer to make moonshine whisky for home consumption, and even a little for his neighbors, than it is for these Representatives of the great wet districts of foreign-born population to make "moonshine" speeches on the floor of this House simply for "home consumption." [Laughter and applause.] Knowing that their case is hopeless, knowing that the unselfish prohibition friends of America have won their battle in a fair and glorious fight, how much better it would be for the high-flying aviator of Gotham and the festive and irrepressible Representative from Erin and from Boston to get down to earth, teach their constituents the wholesome reason in law enforcement, and then lead them in singing that good old hymn, "Ye living men come view the ground where you shall shortly lie."

And as for Chicago's recent heavy vote against prohibition, I remind this House that that is the same city, largely of foreign domination, that believes in keeping almost no law at all on the liquor question. For 40 years it has been against the law of God and man to sell liquor in Chicago on Sunday, and for 40 years 7,000 saloons in Chicago trampled the laws of man and of God by keeping open on Sunday. And when the mayor of Chicago, in response to the demand of the law-enforcement leaders, closed the liquor shops on Sunday the champions of the liquor business, the same leaders and the same rank and file that are now favoring the trampling of the Constitution by continuing beer saloons and the reign of German brewers in politics—these same opponents of prohibition, "past, present, and to come," staged a great demonstration and marched through the streets of Chicago 100,000 strong, boasting gamblers, hoodlums, and harlots in their parade—for they all thrive together—calling on the mayor of Chicago to again trample the law of man and of God by opening saloons on Sunday. This, Mr. Chairman, is said "not in bitterness, but in sorrow," as Henry Grady used to say, but this is the brand of morality and law enforcement which these great liquor centers, chiefly of foreign domination, would transmit and transmute into winking courts and seared consciences for the law-abiding, God-fearing people of America who have tried so long to free themselves from the mighty curse of drink and crime. [Applause.]

Concerning the dignified and yet mistaken strictures of the Anti-Saloon League, made by my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], I feel constrained to say that I hold him personally in high esteem, a man with a Damascus blade for an intellect and an honest regnant conscience. This fact makes it all the more regrettable that he should be so much in error as to criticize harshly the work of the Anti-Saloon League, and to charge the honest men and women who have wrought so unselfishly and so successfully for a sober America, as being their "servile followers." I hold no commission for defending the leaders of the Anti-Saloon League except that commission which an informed conscience compels. I was for a time one of the vice presidents of the Anti-Saloon League of America and one of its unpaid directors. And I speak the truth when I declare that never in secret conclave (if such a conclave were ever held), never in the inner councils of that great body of patriotic, philanthropic men, did I ever see or hear one thing done or one thing proposed that was out of keeping with the highest and noblest ethics. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] said that, disclaiming being a servile follower, the gentleman from Georgia "assumed to be a leader." I plead guilty to the "soft impeachment." I have rejoiced to follow such great God-fearing statesmen as Howard Russell, the venerable father of the Anti-Saloon League; Bishop Luther B. Wilson, its honored president; P. A. Baker, its stalwart superintendent; Ernest H. Cherrington, its towering business director and editor of The American Issue; Edwin C. Dinwiddie, the tireless and efficient legislative secretary; and Wayne B. Wheeler, the astute, clear-headed, and golden-hearted national attorney, who is charged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] with being the author of this law-enforcement bill.

All of these gentlemen are grandly capable men, and there is not one of them who could not have been making far more money through all these years of ceaseless vigil and consecrated effort if they had only chosen to love money better than they have loved human happiness. I personally saw Ernest Cherrington, with ability enough to be governor or president, turn down a salary nearly three times as large as the league paid him in order to continue his unselfish fight against liquor. And as for myself, having been active in trying to drive saloons, through the triumph of a prohibitionized democracy, out of my own State of Georgia, the pioneer prohibition State of the South, I offer apology to no living man for having responded to the call of many other States of the Union, and for having earnestly and honestly tried to lead the people in the saloon-ridden States into the economic and moral blessings of prohibition, which have so greatly enriched my native State.

I heard of a negro boy down in Georgia who was thrown from a mule and terribly shaken up inside and out. The negro doctor was sent for, but things were not going well, and a white doctor was called in consultation; and wishing to defer to his own profession, the white doctor asked of the negro doctor, "Have you formed a diagnosis of this case?" "Yas, sar," replied the negro doctor, "as well as my professional knowledge will justify, sar, I have come to the conclusion that this unfortunate young gentleman is suffering from a scatteration of the insides." "Have you prescribed for him a remedy?" asked the white doctor. "Yas, sar," the colored doctor replied, "I done give him a combined dose of alum and rossum." "What on earth made you give him such stuff as that?" said the white doctor sternly. "Well, sar," answered the negro doctor, "I give him the alum to draw the scattered parts together and the rossum to make 'um stick until they got well." [Laughter.]

The temperance friends of America had long been scattered—the Good Templars, the Sons of Temperance, the Murphy Mettings, the Knights of Jericho, and what not; and then came those brave, farseeing evangels of sobriety and truth, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the fair women who, like the vestal virgins, kept the fires burning on the altar when we men said the thing could not be done. [Applause.] Permit me to say that I have worn their white badge for many years. I wore it to the polls, was elected to Congress with it on, and that I never lowered their standard or mine one inch in order to win one "wet" man's vote. These wise women put scientific temperance education into the curricula of all the schools in all the States of the American Union and sowed down the youth of yesterday with the principles which have at last been led to coronation in the manhood and womanhood of this victorious hour. But theirs was largely and inevitably the work of foundation propaganda, and for the work these noble heroines did I mention in reverent tones the names of the three great presidents of that conquering white ribbon army, Frances E. Willard, Lillian M. N. Stephens—now gone home to God—and Anna Gordon—God bless the name!—on whose ample shoulders their mantle of leadership fitly fell. [Applause.] But sentiment must be enacted into law.

The women then had to trust the tardy men; and the Anti-Saloon League of America, the brother executors of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the other temperance organizations, was born of God and of man for the legislative battle of the hour. This organization, nonsectarian and nonpartisan, has been the "alum and rossum"—the magnet, if you will—that has drawn the scattered temperance forces of America together and held them until victory has been their reward. The criticisms heaped upon these leaders, in the light of their glorious achievements, constitutes to-day the highest testimonial to the fidelity of their unselfish motives and the wisdom and efficiency of their organization. And since the Anti-Saloon League of America seems to have been such a thorn in the side of those who opposed its methods and its purposes, let me tell you just when it will cease its operations—it will cease to function just as soon as the friends of the liquor interests cease to oppose its worthy efforts toward law enforcement in America and when there is not left a vestige of the devilish and debauching traffic on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

HOPELESS CASE OF THE OPPOSITION.

In face of the hopeless fight of the opposition, I ask, in common parlance, "What's the use?" I find myself wondering why any time should be spent at all in inveighing against prohibition as a governmental principle or a moral and economic measure. That discussion now is purely academic. I hear men asking the foolish question sometimes, "Will our prohibition law hold?" For answer to that question let us think a moment about the process by which the eighteenth amendment would have to be repealed. Two-thirds of Congress must be secured to vote for a constitutional amendment repealing the law just enacted, and then 36 States would have to be found to ratify through their legislatures this constitutional repeal, and everybody knows that that thing can not be done by due constitutional process between now and the judgment day. [Applause.] Would it not be far better, then, far wiser and more patriotic, to spend the balance of our days trying to create a sentiment for law enforcement instead of voicing sentiments on the floor of this House and giving those sentiments out to the world which will tend to encourage the violation of this wholesome national law?

SOBRIETY AND GOVERNMENTAL FAIRNESS.

As to the repeal of war-time prohibition, it seems there can be but one answer from any friend of sobriety and governmental fairness. I believe that President Wilson is not only a very wise but also a very fearless and conscientious man. I believe he honestly felt in recommending the repeal of war-time prohibition that, the end of the war being in sight, he should not in any sense take advantage of a war-emergency measure after the emergency is practically past. And if demobilization of the Army should be accomplished by due process before the constitutional amendment becomes operative on the 16th of next January, then, "dry" as I am, much as I loathe even one day's life for that saloon, which is the breeder of drunkenness and crime, the trysting place of anarchy, the companion of the brothel, and the gateway to hell, still I would not have the President of the United States trample his conscience or violate his oath of office for the sake of three or four months of prohibition. [Applause.]

There is a better way. Much as I think a great and good man was mistaken in his recommendation to Congress, which was construed as a presidential call for repeal before demobilization be actually accomplished, and much as I would have him redeem his oath of office when and only when demobilization is completed, I believe the Congress of the Nation should promptly enact an emergency prohibition statute or a prohibitory tax that would amply bridge over any possible interim that may occur between now and the 16th of January—national constitutional emancipation day.

If the right of Congress to make such a statutory law is questioned, as I have heard it questioned during this discussion, I answer that surely, if it is competent for this Government, by statutory enactment, to lay its hand on the drug stores of my home city and in every hamlet and village in America and stop the sale of narcotics for the preservation of human health and happiness, surely it is competent and incumbent for the same Government to take any action that is necessary to rid our citizenship of the poison and debauchery of liquor. And if the liquor dealer and the brewer complain that they are being too sharply and suddenly dealt with let them remember that any business which has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a nuisance has no right to expect a single day's life beneath the protection of a flag that stands for human happiness and the sanctity and sobriety of the American home. When Youngstown, Ohio, was threatened with riot the saloons were ordered closed and no doubt when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] was mayor of Boston he did the same thing.

In God's name—in the name of American gratitude and national decency—let no such liquor shop or beer saloon welcome home a single hero who fought for the safety of America; and having tasted of the national guardianship of sobriety, with all of its sanity and sweetness for a few happy weeks, let not the Nation which is now, as never before, the beacon light of the peoples of the earth, plunge again into the orgies of drink and shame, making the last few weeks of bacchanalian revelry a sickening prelude of that "far off divine event"—now, thank God, no longer far—toward which the resolute heart of America has so bravely and grandly moved. [Applause.]

PATRIOTS WILL STAND BY THE LAW.

But whatever may be said of war prohibition, this measure must be short lived. The supreme consideration is the enactment of a law that will, through proper enforcement, permanently guarantee the spirit of the constitutional amendment that has been ratified. All patriotic men, irrespective of former affiliations, will unite in a strong program for law enforcement. If 2¾ per cent beer should be allowed to be sold, the whole spirit of the eighteenth amendment would be trampled under foot. Three great evils of the liquor traffic would abide: The drinking saloon would be retained, the appetite for drink would be retained, and the baleful effects of a sodden drunkenness would, alas, remain. These three things would be the result of such a concession, for I doubt whether there is a man on the floor of this House who believes that the breweries and beer saloon keepers would track the law. The question was asked by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON], who, I am frank to say, displayed a fluency of speech and a genius of combat worthy a better cause, if we prohibitionists are afraid to trust the courts to interpret the meaning of "intoxicating liquors"? No; not exactly; but we are afraid, from a long and bitter experience, to trust the makers and venders of 2¾ per cent beer—for they are the same people who have been claiming to believe in "local option"—that a State or a community voting to be free from the liquor traffic ought to be allowed to be free; and yet these so-called "local-option" devotees have been shipping liquor into dry territory all over America and outraging the law which they had claimed to uphold. [Applause.]

We tried to be liberal with the brewers and near-beer dealers in my home city of Atlanta, after our State prohibition law went into effect, but they would not allow us to trust them; 2 per cent beer was for a time allowed, and here is what Judge Nash Broyles, now on the Court of Appeals, but then judge of the police court in Atlanta, said: "A near-beer law is practically unenforceable, as you can not have a chemist with every barrel to see that the beer is light, and besides, men can get drunk on 2 per cent beer if they take enough of it."

And this fearless judge was elected to the Court of Appeals by the whole State of Georgia on the record which he made on law enforcement in the capital of the State. He stands to-day for bone-dry prohibition and enforcement laws that will actually enforce. And on the question of law enforcement, Gov. Dorsey, of Georgia, has sent me the following telegram:

ATLANTA, GA., July 9, 1919.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Prohibition laws in Georgia are being as well enforced as any other laws against crime. Violators are being apprehended daily and many of them, both white and black, are being sent to the chain gang. Our Georgia laws should probably be strengthened and the United States Government, now that the prohibition amendment has been passed, should lend a helping hand. It is only a question of time before, in my opinion, traffic in whisky will be reduced to a minimum.

HUGH M. DORSEY,
Governor of Georgia.

Here is another telegram which deals with labor's attitude on this question:

ATLANTA, GA., June 17, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Your Flag Day speech in Congress made history. It was bomb-proof. The demonstration on the steps of the Capitol last Saturday in favor of continuing beer saloons under constitutional prohibition was a reflection on the American flag and the native-born laboring men of America. This sentiment was heartily approved at a great mass meeting in our church Sunday night. Organized labor feels that it has been done an injustice by its chief representative in making it the goat in the interest of Milwaukee, Aurora, and other cities of like fame. By unanimous standing vote, after many enthusiastic speeches by the laboring men themselves, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved by the Tabernacle Congregation of Atlanta, That we are heartily opposed to any change in the war-time prohibition act passed by Congress. We believe that the agitation for repeal and for continued beer saloons originates with the brewers and that their agents have mobilized a lot of foreigners to put on a public demonstration in the interest of the manufacturers of debauchery. We heartily resent the effort to saddle the responsibility of a 'wet' Nation upon the backs of organized labor."

JOHN W. HAM,
Pastor Baptist Tabernacle.

Mayor James L. Key, of Atlanta, where we have had prohibition since 1908, says:

Prohibition has proved a success in Atlanta in every way. Crime, drunkenness, and vice have decreased. The general efficiency of the body of citizens has increased. General business conditions have improved. The law meets with the approval of the community and is enforced as well as other measures.

Chief of Police James L. Beavers says:

Drunkenness has decreased more than 50 per cent. Prohibition has been very successful here, and it will be more so when we get the nation-wide prohibition law July 1.

RIGHT IS NEVER EXTREME.

Honest men on the floor of this House complain that this bill is too extreme, but there is no such thing as a man's being "extremely right." He is simply right or wrong. No genuinely honest man objects to a law against pilfering. Though the penalty for stealing a box of matches be half a hundred years, the honest man is absolutely safe. And the sellers of liquor have caused the friends of sobriety, in dry territory, to suffer so much, we are afraid of anything that looks like beer or smells like beer—for the brewery interests are back of it all, and the brewery in politics and in morals in a nation that has lifted a "stainless banner" above its head, is a travesty and a tragedy all in one.

In vain did Neal Dow, the great old prophet of Maine, dream and work and dream; in vain did John B. Gough lift his winsome, pleading voice; in vain did John P. St. John add cleansing glory to the pioneer prohibition State of the West; in vain did the unique and fearless Sam Jones hurl his thunderbolts at the liquor that one time sought his ruin; in vain has George Stuart wielded the sickle of his entrancing power; in vain has Mary Harris Armor electrified a continent and Nannie Webb Curtis and Carolyn Geisel have captivated the hearts and consciences of men and women; in vain have those wizards of speech and philosophy, John G. Wooley, Clinton Howard, and Sam W. Small, dedicated their marvelous eloquence; in vain has Richmond P. Hobson submarined the liquor traffic with the pitiless dynamics of his scientific logic; and forever vain and useless the marvelous measure of William J. Bryan's stainless devotion—in vain, I say, and useless all, the transforming world-lifting efforts of these mountain-peak men, with all the white-ribbon handmaidens of God who have upheld them with their ideals, their prayers, and their tears, if this high and holy cause in this hour of its glorious triumph is to lay down the bars and open the doors to the law-breaking minions of the demon they have fought so long.

For whom do my worthy colleagues plead in their opposition to what they call the "drastic measures" of this bill? They say that they believe in law enforcement. Then let us have a law with teeth in it. This law is intended only for the law-breaker, and surely there is no one on the floor of this House who would lift his voice in his behalf. A man who will deliberately fill his pockets with money through the financial depletion and the physical and moral debauchery of those who patronize his business, whether legal or illegal, will soon have his conscience so seared that he will be found doing anything scheming and devilish in order to perpetuate his business or to keep out of jail; and sympathy should be given by this Congress, not to this vampire of civilization but to that fair civilization itself from which the lawbreaking vampire sucks the blood of his ignoble existence. There is but one course, gentlemen, for patriotic men to pursue—stand by the majesty of this righteous and wholesome law, for the protection of the home, for the sacredness of humanity, for the sobriety of America, and the happiness of the world. [Applause.]

HON. WAYNE B. WHEELER ON "CONCURRENT POWER."

One of the opponents of this bill took the occasion to quote a sentence or two from what Hon. Wayne B. Wheeler, the national attorney of the Anti-Saloon League, said concerning concurrent power. As he failed to quote the statement fully, I ask the privilege of submitting herewith the following which represents the position of Mr. Wheeler on this important subject:

It has been stated quite recently by counsel for the distillers' committee that the "concurrent power" clause in the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States (the prohibition amendment) will render the law a dead letter.

Section 2 of the amendment is giving the wets a great deal of comfort. They are claiming that it is not self-executive, and that it is necessary to enact concurrent enforcement legislation to make it effective.

The "concurrent power" clause, which is coming in for a large share of public attention now, is included in section 2 of the prohibition amendment, which reads as follows:

"The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Opponents of prohibition assert that the eighteenth amendment can not be enforced until the State and Federal Governments enact identically the same laws on this subject matter; that concurrent power means joint action, or exactly the same action on the issue involved. The friends of the eighteenth amendment insist that concurrent power simply means equal power or authority on the part of the State and Federal Governments to enact prohibition legislation, and that the use or failure to use this power by one does not prevent the other unit of Government from using its full power, or part of its power, to carry out the manifest purpose of the eighteenth amendment.

In constitutional law, power is simply the right to take action in respect to a particular subject matter. The power referred to in this amendment is the governmental power to enact legislation to enforce the prohibition amendment.

In the long line of decisions the word "concurrent" has been construed to mean the following: "Contributing to the same event or effect," "cooperating," "seeking the same objects." These and many other similar court constructions make clear that two units of government may be given authority or power to carry out the purpose of the eighteenth amendment. There is no limitation on this power except that these units of government can only use that authority in harmony with the purpose of the eighteenth amendment.

The opponents of the eighteenth amendment err in claiming that concurrent legislation must be enacted. The Constitution does not require concurrent legislation before the eighteenth amendment can be enforced. It simply confers concurrent power upon the State and Federal Government. There is a vast difference between two units of government having power to do a thing and making the enforcement of a constitutional provision contingent upon the State and Federal Governments enacting concurrent legislation.

The section in controversy was inserted by the House in place of the provision which was originally adopted by the Senate, which reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The Judiciary Committee of the House raised the question whether the States would have complete and ample authority to enforce prohibition if the Senate provision was adopted. Such power was not exactly given. Many of the ablest lawyers in the Senate contended that States would have power to enforce prohibition under the clause which they adopted, because power was not specifically limited or taken from the States. If the Senate provision had been adopted, the courts probably would have construed the amendment to give ample power to the States to enforce laws providing for the prohibition of the beverage liquor traffic. It will therefore be seen that the clause which the wets hope will weaken the amendment and render it unenforceable was designed to strengthen it and give it effectiveness.

The doubt which arose in the minds of some of the Congressmen concerning the power of the State under the Senate provision was based upon decisions of the Supreme Court like the following:

"Whenever the terms in which a power is granted by Congress, or the nature of the power required that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress, the subject is as completely taken from the State legislature as if they had been expressly forbidden to act on it."

The House Judiciary Committee, in order to make this power of the States more certain, inserted the "concurrent" clause provision in the act, so that there would be no doubt that the State would have full power to enforce the prohibition within its borders.

HOW AMENDMENT WILL BE ENFORCED.

Congress, having the power as well as the obligation to enact legislation to enforce the amendment, will doubtless prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes and place the obligation upon the Federal courts to enforce the prohibition act and outline the procedure for its enforcement. It is stated by opponents of prohibition that this policy will result in a conflict between the Federal and State laws and that concurrent power under such a condition is impossible.

The Constitution must be construed in its entirety. Article VI of the Constitution was not amended or repealed by the eighteenth amendment. Article VI says:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authorities of the United States, shall be the superior law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the Constitution or the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Supreme Court in construing this has said: "It must always be borne in mind that the Constitution and laws of the United States are as much a part of the law of every State as its own local laws and constitution." This power of the Federal Government over the State Government was illustrated in the West Virginia case decided by the Supreme Court in January, 1919. The court said:

"When Congress exerts its authority in a matter within its control, State laws must give way in view of the regulation of the subject matter by the superior power conferred by the Constitution."

While the State is given equal power within its jurisdiction to enact laws prohibiting the liquor traffic, if it does not use that power to the full extent, this will not prevent the Federal Government from carrying out the full purpose and power of the eighteenth amendment as authorized in the Constitution.

There will be no more conflict than there is now between offenses on the same subject matter which are defined by a Federal and a State Government. There are varying and even conflicting standards between the State and Federal laws as to what is intoxicating liquor, adulterated foods, drugs, etc. A citizen of a State who is inclined to break these laws will have to inform himself as to the provisions of both Federal and State enactments and conform his conduct to both. The eighteenth amendment notifies him that the beverage liquor traffic is prohibited, and there is no limit on the power of the State or Federal legislative bodies in passing laws which have a reasonable relation to the end authorized. The Federal court will enforce the Federal acts. The State courts will have at least as much authority to make arrests and help to enforce this Federal law as they have to enforce any other Federal law. Section 1014 of the Federal statutes provides:

"For any crime or offense against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any commissioner of a circuit court, to take bail, or by any chancellor, judge of a supreme or superior court, chief or first judge of common pleas, mayor of a city, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, of any State where he may be found, and agreeable to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested or imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by law has cognizance of the offense. Copies of the process shall be returned as speedily as may be into the clerk's office of such court, together with the recognizances of the witnesses for their appearance to testify in the case. And where any offender or witness is committed in any district other than that where the offense is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of the district where such offender or witness is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal to execute, a warrant for his removal to the district where the trial is to be held." (R. S., sec. 1014; acts Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, sec. 33, 1 Stat., 91; Mar. 2, 1793, c. 22, sec. 4, 1 Stat., 334; Aug. 22, 1842, c. 188, sec. 1, 5 Stat., 516.)

The State courts, with the larger number of officers and more adequate law enforcement machinery, will enforce the laws enacted by the States in order to make prohibition effective within their borders. When a State and a municipality have "concurrent power" to prohibit the liquor traffic, each enacts its own laws. The municipality enforces its own laws within the municipality. The State enforces its State law not only in the municipality but throughout the whole State. Each unit of government enforces its laws throughout the entire territory within its jurisdiction. Many dry States give not only "concurrent power" to the municipal council and the State legislature to prohibit the sale of liquor, but they confer "concurrent" jurisdiction on city, township, county, and district courts to enforce the law.

The suggestion that the "concurrent power" clauses gives one State authority to enact a law which will apply in another State will not be taken seriously by either lawyers or laymen. "Concurrent power" simply means equal power for both the State and the Nation to enact laws prohibiting the beverage liquor traffic within their respective borders.

To give two sovereignties "concurrent power" over a given subject matter is not a new doctrine. Both the Federal and State Governments have power to regulate elections for Congress. (See Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., 662; Commonwealth v. Kitchen, 141 Ky., 657; In re Coy, 127 U. S., 743.)

It has been held by the court that persons owing duty to two sovereignties are amenable to both. Justice Grier in rendering this opinion said:

"Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a State or Territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable to punishment for an infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both. * * * That either or both may (if they see fit) punish such an offender can not be doubted. Yet it can not be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offense; but only that by one act he has committed two offenses, for each of which he is justly punishable. He could not plead the punishment by one in bar to a conviction by the other."

Justice Hook in case of McKinney against Landon said:

"It is no defense to a prosecution for a violation of the antitrust laws of a State that the accused by the same general course of conduct has also violated the similar laws of the United States, or, indeed, has been punished therefor." (209 Fed., 300, p. 307.)

It has been repeatedly held that when the Government is given jurisdiction over a subject matter it may enact laws to make its power effective. The Supreme Court said, in re Raher (140 U. S., 345), that the Wilson Act was "enacted in the exercise of its police powers." In the case of Hoke against State it says:

"Congress may adopt not only the necessary but the convenient means necessary to exercise its power over a subject completely within its power, and such means may have the quality of police regulation. * * * Our dual form of government has its perplexities. State and Nation have different spheres of jurisdiction, as we have said, but it must be kept in mind that we are one people, and the powers reserved to the States, and those conferred on the Nation, are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare, material, and moral." (227 U. S., 309.)

If "concurrent power" may be exercised by State and Nation without this provision in the eighteenth amendment, it will not be hindered by having the authority for the exercise of the power written in the Constitution. It is manifest from this and other decisions that the court is not alarmed at any effort to bring about cooperation between the State and Federal Governments. The Federal court would find no more difficulty in sustaining laws under this "concurrent power" clause than State courts find in sustaining laws which give "concurrent power" to a municipality and a State to prohibit the sale of liquor and then confer "concurrent" jurisdiction upon local and State officers to enforce the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman from Missouri to yield me just one minute.

Mr. IGOE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Georgia that we did have a street railway strike in Boston while I was mayor, but the saloons were not closed, and there was not the slightest hint that the saloons should close. The men in the business in Boston conduct their places in an orderly way. There was a street railway strike, however, in Bangor, Me.—prohibition Bangor and prohibition Maine—and the mayor in a public statement said that he was obliged to close the saloons there in order to protect the lives and the property of the people. [Applause.] And I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] whether that statement is true or not.

Mr. HERSEY. I do not know.

Mr. GALLIVAN. It is positively true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It so appeared in the press and was a matter of public comment all through this country.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKELL].

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I have reduced my remarks to manuscript, and as the time is short I would ask not to be interrupted.

The controversy over the question as to whether one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, or 2.75 per cent, or some other per cent should be fixed in this bill, or whether it should be left out entirely, is only the beginning of your difficulties.

It is the reward for the mistaken idea that the way to make people good is by legislation instead of education.

With sufficient rope and persistence along the same lines, the program will ultimately defeat itself.

All we opposed to prohibition are obliged to do is pursue a course of watchful waiting and observe once more how the phenomena of human nature work.

You might as well regulate by force the morals of the people as to change by legislation the mentality of any individual. It can not be done.

My unequivocal opposition to prohibition has been taken out of a sense of duty as to what I consider right.

I am in no way connected with any selfish interests to be benefited by the professional liquor traffic.

ADVOCATE OF INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS.

To characterize my conduct by charging that I am the "saloon advocate" and that "I openly advocate and defend the lawless liquor business" is a perversion of my stand in favor of individual rights and the preservation for each person of a choice between right and wrong.

A PYRAMID OF LAWS WILL NOT ACCOMPLISH MORAL REFORM.

My view is that a pyramid of laws will not accomplish moral reform. My judgment is that prohibition by legislation, confiscation, and force will not benefit society. My opinion is that the eighteenth amendment violated the powers reserved to the several States and established a dangerous precedent for the future.

STATE RIGHTS.

The United States Supreme Court in Crane against Campbell, decided December 10, 1917, Two hundred and forty-fifth United States, page 305, held that a "State has power absolutely to prohibit manufacture, gift, purchase, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within its borders without violating the guaranties of the fourteenth amendment."

The United States Supreme Court in West Virginia against Adams Express Co., Two hundred and nineteenth Federal Reporter, page 794, held "That the Congress has power to outlaw and exclude absolutely or conditionally from interstate commerce intoxicating liquors."

The New York Court of Appeals in People against Wynehamer, Thirteenth New York, page 378, declared unconstitutional "An act for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime," passed April 9, 1855, upon the grounds that it violated the provision in the constitution of the State which declares that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law" (which provision is similar to that of the fifth amendment of the United States Constitution), inasmuch as the act did not discriminate between liquors existing when it took effect as a law and such as might thereafter be acquired by importation or manufacture.

This decision was cited and followed by the New York Court of Appeals in its decision of October, 1918, in Fougera & Co. against the City of New York, where it held invalid an ordinance prohibiting the sale of patent or proprietary medicines in the city of New York unless the names of the ingredients of every such medicine be registered in the department of health, where it did not except existing stores of merchandise in the hands of druggists or other dealers who did not know the ingredients and could not state them.

The United States Supreme Court in Purity Extract Co. against Lynch, Two hundred and twenty-sixth United States, page 192, said:

> The State, within the limits we have stated, must decide upon the measures that are needful for the protection of its people.

The limits mentioned in the same decision are stated as follows:

> The inquiry must be whether, considering the end in view, the statute passes the bounds of reason and assumes the character of a merely arbitrary fiat.

I therefore take it that the Supreme Court has recognized in most unequivocal fashion the right of each State to "decide upon the measures that are needful for the protection of its people."

Congress being vested with the power to "outlaw and exclude absolutely or conditionally from interstate commerce intoxicating liquors" and the States with power under the decisions to regulate their own internal affairs, why was this not a satisfactory balancing of the powers of the Union on the one hand and of the several States on the other?

WAR-TIME PROHIBITION SHOULD BE REPEALED.

With reference to the rider in the Agricultural appropriation bill, I contend that it should be repealed immediately.

Incidentally I believe the practice of attaching riders to appropriation bills should be prohibited.

It is to be noted that the specific reason given for this war-time prohibition law is found in the language thereof, as follows:

> For the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation, and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy.

It was specifically and most emphatically a war measure.

Upon any other grounds Congress exceeded its authority in passing the same.

Its purposes stated in the law having been accomplished, the law should be repealed.

NO NECESSITY FOR WAR-TIME PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT.

It therefore seems to me that this Congress is in no logical position to pass an enforcement act of the so-called war-time prohibition, and that instead it should be repealed.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT ENFORCEMENT LEGISLATION.

As to enforcement legislation for the eighteenth amendment, the pending measure is an extension of the rider idea.

It looks to me as if the plan was to kiss through war-time prohibition because of the reluctance of many to refuse constitutional enforcement even though coupled with a rider.

Possibly there are some who would consider on its merits and support an enforcement act for the eighteenth amendment alone, while continuing to work for a resubmission and repeal thereof.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT DID NOT TRULY REPRESENT.

The opinion is held by many, and I believe by an overwhelming majority of our people, that representative government did not truly represent the majority sentiment throughout this country by the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

APPEAL FOR RESUBMISSION.

It is plainly not unreasonable for me to make an appeal to prohibitionists and antiprohibitionists alike to resubmit the prohibition proposition for the judgment of the American people.

To accomplish this result I introduced on the opening day of the present session of Congress House joint resolution 7. I am not particular as to whether the resolution be in the language and form as introduced by myself, but it does seem to me that our anxiety to secure to the American public an opportunity for expression of sentiment upon this important issue should result in us being able forthwith to obtain the best judgment of this Congress as to the exact form such a resolution should take, and that the necessary two-thirds vote of both Houses of this Congress to submit the same, and ratification by three-fourths of the several States, should be forthcoming, and this irrespective of our personal views upon the merits of prohibition.

The resubmission as now proposed by myself would be a testimonial of the confidence of this Congress in the people of this country. The voters of this country are the first and the last forum to which we must go for the power and support of representative government. While in between elections the people are sometimes and in some places forgotten, it can not do us any harm to seek the fountain source of power for a certificate of approval or repudiation relative to the ratification of the eighteenth amendment.

NOT NARROW-MINDED ABOUT THE SITUATION.

I am not narrow-minded about the situation. I have no sympathy with that mental attitude of the champion or opponent of prohibition who calls his adversary a hypocrite or a faker. There are undoubtedly some in both camps who are selfish, arbitrary, and unreasonable and without tolerance for views different from their own. For my part, when without convincing proofs to establish the fact, I accept in good faith the sincerity of all who vote for, favor, or support prohibition legislation, and I expect them to accord to me the same honesty of purpose.

EXTENSIVE AND INTENSIVE CAMPAIGNS OF PUBLICITY AND PROPAGANDA.

While holding these views, I also contend that there are times when extensive and intensive campaigns of publicity and propaganda are launched in this country to influence the attitude on public questions of elective and appointive Government officials, and there are times when judgments are formed and acts performed under the force of these influences.

We need more of the spirit of George Washington and of Abraham Lincoln as our inspirational guide than we do of organized and subsidized propaganda.

Some one once said that whisky had more enemies in public and more friends in private than any other form of animal, vegetable, or liquid life. I am not applying this reference to anyone in particular, but I hope the day of consistency may speedily come.

WAITED LONG FOR SOME ONE TO CHAMPION THE CAUSE OF THE PEOPLE.

I patiently waited a long time for some one in public life to take up the fight against prohibition and was amazed to find that no one seemed to come forth to lead the contest. I finally took it upon myself to champion the cause of the people in the preservation of their personal liberty and against an unnecessary invasion of their privileges.

REPUTABLE CITIZENS MADE TO FEEL LIKE CRIMINALS.

If the passage of sumptuary legislation is allowed to continue, the men and women of this country will be compelled to uphold blue laws or made to feel like criminals in the exercise of their personal liberty.

The men and women of this country do not want their morals regulated by force. They want to live as brave men and women, fighting their own battles and meeting their own temptations.

Conscripts and volunteers of men, women, whole industrial organizations with every facility at hand, some at the fighting front, others on the way, and the remanider making their contribution to support the fighting Army—America, united and marching to martial music, won the war. A people able to accomplish such a result are not infants in arms, requiring the benign protection of prohibition legislation to protect them against their evil tendencies.

WRONGDOERS SHOULD BE PUNISHED AND CONTROLLED.

The theory and practice of our Government in dealing with wrongdoers, as I have always understood it, is to restrain and punish them. Because there is a minority who have abused the use of intoxicating liquors, and there are no doubt profiteers in the liquor traffic who take unfair advantage of their opportunities, is not sufficient reason to cause a reversal of the usual administration of our laws. These wrongdoers should be dealt with and punished as they deserve. We should not be asked, instead of governing these weaklings and wrongdoers and punishing them according to their just deserts, to allow them to become the masters of the situation and we give way and submit to their control.

COMMENDATION.

Since my declaration in favor of an amendment to the Constitution which, if adopted, will secure to the people the right of a referendum vote upon the prohibition proposition, I have received correspondence from constituents in my own district, and generally throughout the United States, commending in most positive manner the action taken by myself. The protests received have been few and insignificant in comparison.

MAJORITY OF PEOPLE OPPOSED TO PROHIBITION.

While we who oppose prohibition may not be a majority in this Congress, we contend that there is an overwhelming majority of the people of this country outside of Congress opposed to prohibition.

PROHIBITION AN UNWARRANTED INTERFERENCE WITH PERSONAL LIBERTY.

I still adhere to my proposition that the prohibition amendment constitutes an unwarranted interference with personal liberty and violates the powers reserved to the several States.

VINDICATION WILL BE WON.

Those of us who as a matter of conviction believe that this legislation is wrong in principle have still the right to assert our honest convictions in the hope that later on vindication of our present position will be won, and in the meantime we will have the satisfaction of performing our duty as we conceive it, even though not voting with the majority of this House.

THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

We have heard much said that it is no longer a matter of opposition to prohibition legislation, but that loyalty requires the giving of our approval to the eighteenth amendment. In this connection I might say that we have long had as a part of the Constitution the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which are best known for the failure to enforce them, and it does seem to me appropriate at this time that we might well give our attention to the enforcement of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

Amendment 15 provides:

The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

DEMOCRACY VERSUS DICTATORSHIP.

My view of a democracy is that the individual is only required to sacrifice such privileges as are essentially necessary to be sacrificed to protect people in a state of society with reference to their lives, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and that anything beyond this tends toward the creation of a dictatorship and should not be allowed.

We can not afford to establish an organized minority to act as the Czar of this country.

MAJORITY SHOULD RECOGNIZE THE RIGHTS OF THE MINORITY.

Even a majority should not willfully override the rights of a minority. If the democracy of this country is to remain well balanced the majority must always have a due regard for the rights of the minority. They may have the power, but they have no moral right to regulate what the minority shall drink or eat, or the clothes that they shall wear, or the church they shall attend.

In a despotic form of government the majority might force its will upon the minority and attempt to regulate religion, the clothes to be worn, and the food to be eaten, but we hardly expect such to be the practice in free America.

Hundreds of thousands of employees are being thrown out of employment in an attempt to establish prohibition which is not likely to prohibit, and if it does is bound to create evils of its own.

PROHIBITION A MORAL ISSUE.

In my opinion prohibition is purely a moral issue, and not within the sphere of legislation upon any grounds other than for revenue, the regulation of the police power of the States, and in war times for the conservation of food. It being a moral issue, sincere advocates of prohibition should confine themselves to an appeal to the conscience and the morals of the individual, and they will find sooner or later that to pursue any other method will prove a boomerang, and their cause will be injured thereby rather than helped.

CHURCHES AND MINISTERS.

One of the churches in my congressional district, through its official board, recently voted to express its opposition to my stand upon this subject "in disregarding the sentiments of the vast majority of the Protestant church members of his [my] district, and in giving support and encouragement to the saloon and the brewery sympathizers."

My answer has been made to the perverted characterization of my attitude as supporting the saloon and the brewery sympathizers.

I am not bigoted, and am one of those who believe that the question as to whether a man is a Catholic, a Jew, a Protestant, or whatever else he may happen to be does not enter into the proposition. The attempt to make a religious alignment is to my mind another one of the un-American features of the whole proposition. I challenge the statement that a majority of the Protestant church members in my district are opposed to the action taken by myself. The best proof of that fact is that in my last campaign for reelection to Congress, not only in the very church which afterwards passed the resolution mentioned but in answer to a communication from the Kings County committee of the Prohibition Party I informed them all, well in advance of the election at which I was successful for the third time, where I stood. At the primary preceding the said election I was nominated on the prohibition ticket and promptly declined it. I had also voted in Congress against the submission of the proposed prohibition amendment to the Constitution.

St. Timothy's Church of Brooklyn, speaking through the rector, Rev. Charles E. Taylor, forwarded me on June 3 this message:

I strongly commend your action in Congress in re prohibition, but you are marked for slaughter by the antisaloon forces. You will win.

Henry Ward Beecher once remarked:

If you say to me that I ought not to drink perhaps I would agree with you; but if you tell me I must not drink, I will drink, because I have a natural right to do so—to drink what I please.

The Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott once said:

Personally, I have entire respect for the total abstainer who really does abstain, and also respect for the one who believes that it is legitimate to use wine in moderation upon the dinner table; but I find it very difficult to maintain respect for the total abstainer who banishes wine from the dinner table and then drinks out of a bottle from the closet between meals and calls it medicine. About such a one there appears to me a rather serious deficiency, which it is charitable to hope is intellectual rather than moral. Such imbibers are often entirely honest, but they are easily deluded.

USE OF LIQUORS FOR MEDICINAL PURPOSES.

It is to be observed that the eighteenth amendment only prohibits the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. There is no prohibition against the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It requires very little stretch of the imagination to look forward into the future and to observe, if the prohibition program is to be persisted in, the vast abuses that will grow out of the drug-store liquor traffic.

PRACTICAL REFORM THE REMEDY FOR EXISTING EVILS.

It is undoubtedly true that many of those who have been engaged in the selling or dispensing of alcoholic beverages have never taken into consideration the great trust imposed in them, but legislation could be passed to remedy this situation. It would have been a practical reform if some of the vast expenditures made in the effort to accomplish prohibition could have been used to provide safeguards and protect the public against inferior goods. Proper governmental supervision and stricter regulation would have protected the public against the existing evils and have established the highest standard of purity for the beverages consumed.

PROHIBITION IN VIRGINIA AND ELSEWHERE.

The following extract is from the editorial columns of the Charlottesville (Va.) Daily Progress of April 3:

Drunkenness is not the only evil of mankind. It is possible for some things to be quite as bad, if not worse, than even the violation of the liquor laws of the State. It has been held for years in Virginia, and for the most part by the common law, that no officer could arrest an offender without a warrant, except in case of a felony, or unless the misdemeanor was committed in his presence. If the reports are true, men against whom there is no suspicion are held up and searched, and women on Pullman trains are awakened by flashlights in the hands of officers and at the point of a pistol are compelled to submit to a full investigation of the contents of their traveling bags.

So gross has been the conduct of these official "thugs" that a mayor of a North Carolina city has appealed to the director of railroads and to Gov. Davis for the protection of the women of his State while passing through Virginia. Following upon this comes the seemingly well-authenticated report that a casket containing a corpse was broken open by prohibition officers in southwest Virginia a few days ago in their zeal to convict some unknown person of shipping whisky in a coffin. This "strict and limitless enforcement of the law may be the only way to break up the illegal traffic. If it is, God save the Commonwealth!"

Commissioner Bird S. Coler, of the department of charities, New York City, says:

Since prohibitive restrictions and prices have been placed upon whisky there has been a marked increase in the drug victims at the city's hospitals, and Health Commissioner Copeland says that prohibition will bring about a condition in New York concerning the drug traffic which the most conservative citizen may well contemplate with concern. The same is true in other States where prohibition is already in full force, and as yet no effective plan has been devised to meet this new form of evil. The advocates of prohibition are destructive, not constructive, in their ideas, and no help need be expected from them.

It is well known that within recent years, and notably within the last 10 or 12 years, the area of territory in the United States of America under local or State prohibition laws has considerably increased; but, strange as it may appear, the consumption of alcohol during the same period has not diminished, but right up to the war it actually increased. The actual position is shown very clearly in the fact that whereas in the late nineties the people of the United States consumed on the average less than one-half of the amount of absolute alcohol consumed per head in the United Kingdom, in the five years preceding the war the average per capita consumption of the United States rose to nine-tenths of the average British consumption in the same period. During the war American consumption has exceeded British consumption. (Page 7, State Purchase of the Liquor Traffic, by Ronntree and Sherwell.)

The Washington Star of May 19, 1919, contained the following statement:

Harry W. Mager, acting chief revenue agent of the bureau, declared that illicit drug traffic and use was notable in prohibitive territory, according to report received by him. He accounted for this by the explanation that some traffic channels of "wet goods" had switched to the illicit traffic in drugs.

In an article in the New York Sun of April 23, 1919, ex-Senator Chauncey Depew is quoted as saying:

I understand that prohibition works well in Kansas, but in the dry States I have visited the conversation was all about how to get around the law and which of the many recipes for home manufacture was the best.

Let me read some poetry composed by one of my constituents:

PROHIBITION—PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM "TRUTHFUL BILL."

You may make your cracks at the jumping jacks,
Who bow to their venal gods;
You may have your fling at the guys who sing,
With their souls in their money wads;
But I want to say in the plainest way
To the folks who shout and kneel,
With upturned eyes, looking saintly-wise,
But cold as a gonger-eel,
That they'll never reach, though they pray and preach
And gush like a waterspout,
The golden gate, where the angels wait
With a smile for the "down and out";
Though I toil and slave, I can never crave
The wage of a hypocrite.
Though the law has passed, may it be the last
Where the cranks shall have their way,
And freeborn men must stand aghast,
While fancies rule the day;
Should the land go dry, they may soon descry
The voters' gathering storm,
Which will choke their spout and put to rout
These gargoyles of reform!

L'ENVOI—THE SOLDIER TO THE SLACKER.

There's a world of cheer in the foaming beer
And the warmth of the bubbling wine,
Yet you seized the chance, while we fought in France
And broke the Hunnish line,
To repay our zeal with a base appeal
To cant and bigotry,
And to mock right's cause with your slacker laws,
While we bled to keep you free.

LOSS OF REVENUE.

There will be a loss to the Government of more than $500,000,000 in revenue per annum.

REFERENDUM.

The only solution of the whole proposition, in order to give the people a fair chance, is to resubmit the question of prohibition to a referendum vote. If our faith in representative government is to remain unquestioned, the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States should not be unwilling to have their action submitted for public approval.

I am at a loss to understand why people, whether they believe in prohibition or otherwise, should be unwilling to favor the adoption of an amendment to our Federal Constitution which will obtain for the people of the United States the privilege of voting directly upon the prohibition proposition.

There are many who believe that our system of representative government did not truly express the wishes of the people as to the eighteenth amendment, and in order to settle the proposition in a most satisfactory manner I believe that such a referendum vote should be had.

You will remember that not many years ago it was thought that the selection of United States Senators by the legislatures of the several States was not truly representative of the sentiment of the people of the respective States, and the Federal Constitution was amended to provide for the direct selection of United States Senators by the people.

SOLDIERS.

It was not long ago when our soldiers, sailors, and marines were traveling overseas heartily singing the song—

Away, away, across the seas
To fight the fight of liberty;
We're on our way to Germany;
We're going to lick the Kaiser.

And after they were gone, and while they were engaged in going "over the top," America permitted an organized minority to put prohibition over on them.

There were 4,000,000 of our soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service over there or in this country ready to go over there, and they had no voice upon this important proposition. This, therefore, is another reason why the whole proposition should be submitted anew to all the people of this country.

SMOKING.

If the drys succeed now, the antismoking crusade is the next to be launched. Recently Prof. Frederick W. Roman, of the department of economics of Syracuse University, started a general movement for a Federal amendment prohibiting the use of tobacco. The movement, he said, will be kept in abeyance during the war for "patriotic reasons."

The liberal use of tobacco during the war—has brought to a climax the opposition to it. Now that the war is over, the antitobacco movement will be pushed vigorously.

He said—

The greater part of the prohibitionists will fall in line.

I believe a national amendment prohibiting the use of tobacco in any form will be adopted within two years.

SOCIALISM.

Ex-Representative Martin Dies, after a service of 10 years in this House, during the last session of Congress, when he was retiring from this body, addressed this House, and in part said:

You have taken the fairest and best Government ever known among men, and you are making it into the most despicable socialism.

You took the American people at a time when they believed they could support themselves and their Government, and you are teaching them hour by hour and day by day to expect that their Government shall support them.

No. You will not help the people unless you tell them that the Government has but one duty to the citizen, and that is to protect his life and property and give him an equal and fair race in the world.

Are you teaching him that the duty of the Government is to help him? My beloved country! I do not know, we are losing the greatest Republic the world has ever seen.

To my mind, these remarks apply with equal force to the launching forth of this Government in a paternalistic prohibition effort to regulate the moral conduct of the people of this country, where it is not essentially or fundamentally necessary so to do, to maintain the Government, the rights of the individual, and of society.

The whole prohibition program is making for socialistic gains in this country. With confidence shaken in representative government by its socialistic and paternalistic tendencies the people will grasp at straws in an endeavor to save themselves. The one competitor in the field appealing for support and votes is the Socialistic Party, unless you take into account a worse evil, the activities of the anarchists, the Bolsheviki, and the I. W. W.

The champions of personal liberty are standing fairly and squarely upon the merits of their appeal, and are asking for a referendum vote of the people, and they want nothing to do with the Socialists, Bolsheviki, and the I. W. W., and while the Anti-Saloon League, in its usual fashion, will attempt to handicap the forces favoring the preservation of personal liberty by charging the responsibility for the same at their door, it will, in fact, be the result of those forces which have attempted to invade the rights of the individual.

THE UPLIFT MOVEMENT.

We must not deceive ourselves here, or at any other time, that the movement for prohibition has been entirely a righteous cause. We are compelled to recognize that selfish interests exist back of the whole propaganda, that the campaign was well financed, and the accounts of the moneys received and expended have not, so far as I am advised, ever been published, and it would be very interesting reading, indeed, if the light of publicity could be thrown upon the vast receipts and expenditures of the Anti-Saloon League of this country.

The Anti-Saloon League has an organization apparently most potential and is conducting an extensive and intensive propaganda. Recently they organized the "World's League Against Alcoholism." They have expended large sums of money in support of their dry propaganda, and more than once it has been intimated that pledges have been asked in advance from candidates for election to Congress. In the last Congress a resolution was passed to investigate the activities of the National Securities League in connection with the election of Members of Congress, and it seems to me that a similar investigation should be had with reference to the activities in congressional campaigns of the Anti-Saloon League.

WE WILL UPHOLD THE LAWS WHILE WORKING FOR A REPEAL.

As good American citizens, loyal to our country, we will support all prohibition laws but at the same time exercise our equally fundamental right as American citizens to work for the repeal thereof. In support of this right we have no less an authority than the Constitution itself and ex-President John Adams, who, after serving as the Chief Executive of our country, served in the Congress of the United States, where he advocated it to be his duty to present all petitions coming from his constituents, even if they went to the extent of changing the form of the Government.

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

In the last Congress, and again in this one, I voted to submit an amendment to the Constitution conferring the right of woman suffrage. I believe that the women of this country will exercise the franchise with due tolerance for the rights of the individual and not be unwilling to submit this entire prohibition proposition to a referendum vote.

THE WORKINGMAN.

The following is from a recent statement by Samuel Gompers:

INVADING A MAN'S HABITS.

It is not a question of right or wrong. It is not a question of whether we approve or disapprove of beer or drinking. It is his habit. And when you invade a man's habits, what happens? You upset that man. You unsettle him. Uprooting one habit uproots others. And you find that the man who was heretofore satisfied to labor as he had been laboring, to go home nights and talk or read, becomes restive and discontented. Instead of sitting down to rest and read, he restlessly goes out into the street.

There he meets other men, restless and unsettled like himself. And in the rubbing together of their mutual grievances there are sparks and sometimes fire.

I have heard it stated, and I believe it, that the birth of the Bolsheviki was in prohibition. Harmful as vodka was, it enabled the Russian peasant to find surcease from the dull monotony of his life. Without it he found only trouble and torment and the desire to tear down that which he can not rebuild. And to-day Russia lies bleeding, tortured. It was too big a price to pay.

It is time for all of us to recognize the fact that a thing like prohibition can not be attained by Executive decree.

It can not be pounded, with heavy hand, from the top downward. It must, like democracy, flow from the bottom upward.

Distilled liquors and wines have been stored in wholesale fashion by private citizens throughout the United States, but what about the workingman and the people of small means who can not afford to follow this procedure?

The workingman of this country has repeatedly shown his resentment against legislation which interferes with the use in moderation of intoxicating beverages. During the war labor throughout this country supported its vigorous prosecution and contributed most materially to its successful conclusion. It is most illogical, unjust, and improper that we should repay them with legislation depriving them of their personal liberty.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion I again urge that immediate action be taken by Congress for a resubmission of the prohibition proposition to the several States, with a provision that upon ratification thereof by three-fourths of the States a referendum vote shall be had along the lines of House joint resolution No. 7, introduced by myself on the first day of the present Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, the question has been argued and has been put in issue here whether or not in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment this Congress has the power to prescribe that all liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume shall be barred. It is my purpose to discuss that question in the time I have, although it will bring me in conflict with the position taken by gentlemen of the committee and others for whose legal opinion I have the very highest respect.

It has been urged that the effort on the part of Congress, if it should be made, to fix the alcoholic content of liquor would be an effort by Congress, a legislative body, to construe and interpret the language and the terms of the constitutional provision, and it is urged that since the Legislature has no judicial function, it is without power to define alcoholic liquor as contained in the amendment, because our Constitution divides the Government into its several departments, the powers of which are exclusive each of the other. This position is undoubtedly correct.

This Congress can not construe the meaning of the words "intoxicating liquor" as used in the eighteenth amendment. But that is not the question here. The question here is whether or not as a reasonable regulation, in order to carry out the eighteenth amendment, we can bar liquor which is admittedly nonintoxicating.

Now, there are two sources of power. One source is the power inherent in the Government by virtue of its sovereignty. The Congress has no power of that kind over intoxicating liquor. The second source of power is a special grant by the States or the people; and here we find the justification, because the eighteenth amendment in its second section specifically grants to the Congress the power, by "appropriate legislation," to enforce the provisions of the first section. "Appropriate legislation" necessarily means that legislation which is reasonably necessary to carry out the directions of the first section.

Now, this question is not a new one. The same question has arisen in the past, and reference has been made to the Poinsetta case from the State of Mississippi. Mississippi had a statute prohibiting the manufacture of malt, vinous, spirituous, alcoholic, or intoxicating liquors, and you will notice that under the terms of the statute that all malt liquors are prohibited, whether intoxicating or not. The Poinsetta Manufacturing Co. manufactured a drink which was a malt drink, but which admittedly contained no alcohol whatsoever, and which was admittedly a healthful beverage. It attacked the statute on the ground that it was unconstitutional and violated those provisions both of the State and National Constitutions which protected the citizen in his property from any unjustified action on the part of the State. It said that this statute was unconstitutional because it barred nonintoxicating liquors, because it barred liquors which contained no alcohol; that the power of the State extended only to barring those liquors which were intoxicating—the same argument which is made here under the terms of this amendment. This case finally went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it held that Mississippi, by virtue of its inherent authority as a sovereign State, had plenary power over intoxicating liquor—over nothing else. Everything but intoxicating liquors was protected by the constitutional provision, both of the State and National Constitutions, which protected property. But, notwithstanding that fact, they said Mississippi, by virtue of its inherent authority and sovereignty as an independent State, had the power to bar intoxicating liquors, and having that power, she had the right to pass any measure that made that power effective, and she had the right, in order to prohibit intoxicating liquors, to include liquors which were nonintoxicating. The Supreme Court upheld the statute and said it was not unconstitutional, either as violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States or as violative of any provision of the State constitution placed there to protect citizens in their property.

Now, a distinction is sought to be made. It is argued by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that here the source of power is a constitutional amendment, while there the source of power was the so-called police power of the State. He did not show us why a distinction came from the difference, but he said there was a distinction because there was a difference.

Now, it does not make a particle of difference what the source of the power is. Mississippi had the power to prohibit intoxicating liquor by virtue of its inherent sovereignty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more in which to finish?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENABLE. That was the source of the power, but the power was to prohibit intoxicating liquors. Here the source of the power is a constitutional amendment which gives the United States Government the power to prohibit intoxicating liquors. It is the same power to be exercised by the Federal Government that is exercised by the States. And if it is a reasonable regulation to ban nonintoxicating liquors as a means toward the end of banning intoxicating liquors on the part of the State, it is equally a reasonable regulation on the part of the Federal Government; because it has been held that it is a reasonable means toward the end sought.

I am not talking about the wisdom of the legislation. I am talking about the power which this Congress has to enact it. If it is a proper exercise of the power to bar liquor that has no alcoholic content at all, it is certainly within the jurisdiction of the Congress to fix the alcoholic content of liquor.

Now, once more the point is made that Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power, and it is urged that that means that each one must pass the same law, and it is pointed out that it would be a legal absurdity if the State should have one statute with one penalty and the Federal Government should have another statute with another penalty. I merely wish to submit to you that that is not a legal absurdity at all. Each is given the power to pass legislation to enforce the first section. So the statutes, both of the Congress and of the States, must have a reasonable relationship to the accomplishment of that end. The State passes a law and the Congress passes another law, each having a reasonable relationship to the accomplishment of the end sought. My citizenship is dual. I owe allegiance to two sovereigns—one my State and one the Federal Government. If I violate the State law, the State law punishes me for a violation of its sovereign will. If I violate the Federal law, the Federal law punishes me for violating its sovereign will. The two do not conflict.

We have an illustration of this dual sovereignty. I go to your city and shoot at you on the street. Your municipal authorities take me and try me under a city ordinance because I have violated a law of the sovereignty of the municipality, and I am punished under that. Immediately afterwards the State authorities get me, or I am indicted by a grand jury and tried in the State court under a different statute with different penalties for a violation of the sovereignty of the State, and there is no inconsistency in the provision, but the courts sustain such action daily. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

Mr. BENSON. Gentlemen of the committee, I expect to speak with reference to one particular provision of this bill and not with reference to the bill generally.

I presume that those who are fathering this measure do not intend or propose to put out of business any legitimate industry that is not the business of furnishing alcoholic beverages. To prove that this is so, section 4 of the bill, on pages 9 and 10, contains several exceptions with reference to denatured alcohol, medical preparations, patent medicines, toilet articles, flavoring extracts, vinegar, and so forth. In all of these first provisions the language of the bill originally introduced used the words that this act shall not apply to these particular articles provided they were nonpotable and incapable of being used for intoxicating beverage purposes. All of those exceptions were changed except the one with reference to flavoring extracts. A, B, C, and D were all made to read "nonpotable and unfit for beverage purposes." The one with reference to flavoring extracts is still in the bill "nonpotable and incapable of being used for intoxicating beverage purposes."

Now, the distinguished chairman of the committee stated the other day when he was on the floor that this language is used in 18 different States. I challenge that remark. There is only one State in the United States that uses this exact language, and that is the State of Ohio, where the act was recently passed and has not been construed. I can find nowhere where the word "nonpotable" has ever been construed by any court in the land. The definition of the word "nonpotable" in all the dictionaries is nondrinkable. I do not understand why you should use a word that is so uncommon that it has never been construed, when there are so many other plain English words that might be used; but when you say in one sentence, or part of a sentence, that you may manufacture and sell something to be used for medical or flavoring extract purposes, and then in the very next part of the sentence say provided it is nondrinkable, it seems you have produced a ridiculous situation, because if it is nondrinkable it is nonusable, and there is no use of manufacturing it or selling it. You can not make the flavoring extract without the use of alcohol. The great flavoring extract association of the United States has passed a resolution to that effect, and the best chemists in the world have been trying to find a substitute for alcohol because it is an expensive product to use. Can it be that you people want to pass a bill for the occasional perverts who would use flavoring extracts as they would use the products from the silo; that you are going to prevent the people of the United States—the women of the United States—from having flavoring extracts to put in their ice cream, to put in the soda water, to put in pastry of all kinds. Are we going to do without beverages that we have been accustomed to use, and are we to deprive the people of the country, the men and women of the country, from the use of flavored sweets?

We all knew that the soldiers of this country who have been accustomed to the use of liquor have craved sugar, candy, and other sweets. The increased consumption of sweets will be recognized as soon as this law is put in force. You are putting out of business by the provisions of this bill, unless it is amended, the manufacture of these flavoring extracts. I submit that it should be amended, and I will give you an authority, some of the very distinguished gentlemen of the Anti-Saloon League, to that effect.

I want to read a letter from Frank L. Beggs, the head of the American Centenary Celebration of the American Methodist Missions, written to Mr. R. H. Bond.

CENTENARY CELEBRATION AMERICAN METHODIST MISSIONS,
Columbus, Ohio, June 27, 1919.

Mr. R. H. BOND,
Care of McCormick & Co., Baltimore, Md.

DEAR MR. BOND: I inclose you herewith copy of a telegram signed by Mr. James Cannon, jr., chairman of the national legislative committee, and by Mr. Cherrington, also a member, in which they agree with our request and as you will note have requested Mr. Wheeler to give the same proper consideration.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK L. BEGGS.

(Telegram.)

JUNE 27, 1919.

WAYNE B. WHEELER,
32 Bliss Building, Washington, D. C.:

We have just had conference with Frank L. Beggs, of the Styron Beggs Co., manufacturers of flavoring extracts at Newark, Ohio, who also represents the National Flavoring Extract Manufacturers' Association of the United States, which association strongly urges that bill contain following provision:

"Provided, That it shall not be unlawful under any of the provisions of this act to manufacture, buy, sell, or deal in any medicinal, pharmaceutical, scientific, sacramental, mechanical, culinary, flavoring, or toilet preparations which may contain such percentage of alcohol as may be necessary to extract or hold the constituents in solution, preserve the preparation, or keep it from freezing; provided, however, that no such preparation shall be manufactured, bought, sold, or dealt in for use as an intoxicating beverage."

Best attorneys he has consulted insist that without some such provision the flavoring extract business will undoubtedly be prohibited since leading manufacturers claim that as yet the successful manufacture of flavoring extracts is dependent upon use of alcohol, and there is no known method to make them nonpotable.

We are inclined to believe that this suggestion is reasonable, and we urge your careful consideration for the protection of these interests. Please wire fully immediately Centenary Office, Fair Grounds, your attitude on this point.

JAMES CANNON, Jr.
ERNEST H. CHERRINGTON.

Now, I want to call attention to the bad construction of these sentences. Nonpotable means nondrinkable, and if it does not mean nondrinkable, I would like to have some one tell me what it does mean—to say that flavoring extracts may be made while they are nonpotable and incapable of being used for intoxicating beverage purposes, and then the chairman says that intoxicating beverages have a distinct meaning, that the beverage means something pleasant to take. It does not say nonpotable or incapable, and so forth; it says they must be nonpotable and incapable. In other words, if nonpotable is nondrinkable you can not use them. It says in one place you can manufacture them, when actually you can not.

The deputy commissioner, Mr. Gaylord, of the Internal Revenue Bureau, recommends the striking out of the word "nonpotable." Certainly we can get language that we can all understand without using some word that has never been construed anywhere in the United States. Gentlemen, that is as much time as I want to take, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that the people of this country have with singular unanimity made up their minds to put an end to the traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. I am one of those who think that the plain duty of this Congress at the present time is to pass such reasonable legislation as may be necessary in order to make the will and purpose of our people completely effective.

That the American people have as a matter of fact entered judgment against this traffic seems to me too clear for extended argument. Thirty-two States already have prohibition written into their statutes. Forty-five States have ratified the Federal amendment for national prohibition. Even before that amendment was submitted to the people at all considerably more than one-half of the population of this country and fully nine-tenths of its territory were dry. Before war-time prohibition was ever passed a petition containing more than 8,000,000 names, said to be the largest petition ever presented to a legislative body in the history of the world, was presented here in this House asking for the enactment of this legislation.

And there was abundant reason for this.

Sensible and hard-headed men, acquainted with the practical affairs of life and of business, after long observation and much experience, had become convinced that the organized liquor traffic was a menace to society. As long ago as 1842 Abraham Lincoln, in an address at Springfield, Ill., said:

"Whether or not the world would be vastly benefited by the total and final banishment from it of all intoxicating drinks seems to me not now to be an open question. Three-fourths of mankind confess the affirmative with their tongues, and I believe all the rest acknowledge it in their hearts."

Apart from all other considerations it had become increasingly evident that the use of alcoholic beverages involved a tremendous waste and greatly impaired the efficiency of the Nation from an industrial standpoint.

A committee of 60 prominent American citizens of the very highest economic authority had stated over their signatures that no less than 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs were being destroyed annually in the production of beer and whisky—enough to feed an army of 7,000,000 men for a whole year. The brewers' yearbook for the year 1914, at page 156, had stated "the farm products used in the manufacture of liquors annually is equal to the total value of the crops for Maine, Connecticut, Delaware, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming." The Anti-Prohibition Manual for 1916 had said that the liquor traffic used the product of no less than 300,000 farmers.

Even the Supreme Court of the United States had criticized this traffic as "a source of crime and misery to society."

Morally, socially, and economically the liquor traffic was found guilty, and the passage of the so-called war-time prohibition act, as well as the submission of the amendment to the Constitution, was, in my judgment, a deliberate expression of the great majority of the people of this country that this traffic must not stand upon the order of going, but go at once.

In other words, having tried pretty nearly every other method of control, and having found them all ineffectual, the American people had adopted Lincoln's conclusion expressed at Springfield, Ill., in 1853:

"The most effectual remedy would be the passage of a law altogether abolishing the liquor traffic. There must be no more attempts to regulate the cancer; it must be eradicated."

Gentlemen complain that the legislation proposed here is "drastic" and "radical." As a matter of fact it is no more drastic and no more radical than legislation now to be found upon the statute books of more than 30 States of this Union. In many respects it is less drastic and less radical than is this State legislation. To be sure, it does undertake to make effective the great purpose of our people in passing the war-time prohibition act and in ratifying the Federal amendment; that is to say, it does represent an attempt, to use Lincoln's phrase, "to eradicate the cancer." This bill is designed to make the former legislation effective, and it will fail in its purpose if it does not succeed in doing that.

All this talk about "freedom" and "personal liberty," considering the source from which it comes, is, to my mind, simply ridiculous. Ever since the days of Madam Roland liberty has been made to cover a multitude of sins, itself a robe of purest whiteness thrown over the shoulders of iniquity. I believe in freedom and the liberty of the individual. It is upon that basis that we have completed the fine and noble structure of our American Government. But I confess I am not greatly impressed when I hear the mouthings about liberty uttered by some of those who are most prominent in the public eye to-day. When I read of the murder and rape and all the other brutal and wanton crimes that are being committed to-day by the Bolsheviki in Russia, the fine phrases of Lenin and Trotski about "liberty" do not greatly impress me. And here in our own country every socialist, I. W. W. advocate, every anarchist and proenemy sympathizer, every bomb thrower, and every enemy of American institutions justifies, or attempts to justify, his wicked thought and his traitorous act by an appeal to "liberty."

Mr. Chairman, liberty is indeed sacred, but it is not a whit more sacred than its limitations in the common interest. In my judgment the safety and welfare of society is quite as important as the "liberty" of the brewers and the saloon keepers to manufacture and traffic in alcoholic liquors. [Applause.]

Who are the people, anyway, who are protesting against this legislation as being "drastic," "radical," and contrary to the principles of our Government? Who are the people that are writing us and sending us petitions and telegrams to vote against this bill? Would you say that the great moral forces of the Nation are arrayed against this legislation? What Member of this House has received resolutions passed by any church organization protesting against this bill? What educational or philanthropic society in America has taken a stand against it? How many wives, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts have written letters to Members of this House protesting against the passage of this bill? [Applause.] If any Member of this House has received any communication of this character I would be glad to yield to him such time as may be necessary for him to make the fact known. Much has been said about the opposition of the soldiers to this legislation and the charge has been made broadcast over the country that something has been "put over on them" while they were fighting to preserve our country's principles in Europe. I do not know how it may be with other Members, but so far as I am concerned I have not received a single protest from any soldier, whether returned from service abroad or still in his country's service overseas. It is no doubt true that many of them are not in sympathy with this legislation, but that there is any widespread and outspoken opposition to it from this source I deny. Certainly up to date I have no evidence that such is the fact.

No. The fact is, and we all know it, that every organized association or society that stands for the well-being of the community, that stands for law and order, the elimination of waste, and for moral, social, and civic betterment is strongly in favor of the passage of this legislation. [Applause.]

A day or two ago the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] spoke in most sarcastic vein of the activities of the Anti-Saloon League in promoting the passage of this bill. I hold no brief for the Anti-Saloon League or any of its officers or members. I am not connected with it, directly or indirectly, nor with any other society organized to oppose the saloon or to advance prohibition. But let me say to you that even if all that the gentleman from North Carolina said concerning the Anti-Saloon League be true, it is apparent that they are not the only offenders.

I hold in my hand a printed communication that I presume has come to other Members of Congress, as it has come to me within the last few weeks. It bears the union label and apparently has originated with some organization that is active in creating sentiment opposed to this bill. I have myself received five of these cards within about a month. They are all exactly alike except for the date and the name and address of the signer. The one I have here purports to have been signed by one Joseph Desmarais, address 114 North Church Street, Manchester, N. H., and reads as follows:

[Form of communication to United States Senators and Members of Congress.]

Date ——— ———, 1919.

Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States deprives the citizens of this Republic of a personal right and a personal liberty.

If one right and one liberty can be taken away by constitutional amendment, what is to prevent others being taken away by the same method?

I am sternly and irrevocably opposed to the taking away of any of the natural and inherent rights of free men by amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Therefore I am sternly and irrevocably opposed to any bill passed by Congress providing for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment until such time as the United States Supreme Court has said that the amendment is legally a part of the fundamental law of this Republic.

Therefore I shall be sternly and irrevocably opposed to you or any other Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress who votes in favor of any bill providing for the enforcement of this amendment. Furthermore, I demand that you use every effort in your power to repeal, on or before June 30, the so-called Sheppard amendment to the Agricultural bill. You have only to read the language of the Sheppard amendment to be convinced of its present iniquitous absurdity. If such an amendment were offered at the present session of Congress, it would be almost unanimously defeated, because the occasion for it no longer exists. If it could not be passed now, it ought not be enforced now.

JOSEPH DESMARAIS,
114 North Church Street, Manchester, N. H.

You will note that this communication is an argument against the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and says in so many words that "it deprives the citizens of this Republic of a personal right and a personal liberty," to which might be answered, so does the amendment against slavery. That, too, deprives the citizens of this Republic of what was up to the time of its passage considered "a personal right and a personal liberty."

This card says that the signer "shall be sternly and irrevocably opposed to you—me—or any other Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress who votes in favor of any bill providing for the enforcement of this amendment."

Talk about the Anti-Saloon League, Mr. Chairman. I undertake to say that no more brazen and barefaced attempt was ever made to frighten and browbeat the American Congress than is disclosed in the communication I have just read. I have never answered it or any of the others like it that came to me. I answer it now, however, from my place in this House by reading it into the RECORD of the House, and I say to the gentleman who signed it and sent it to me, as I do to the others who have sent me similar communications, that the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adopted by 45 States of this Union according to the method laid down in the Constitution itself providing for its amendment, and that if he intends to be and remain an American citizen, the only decent, honorable, and safe thing for him and the organization back of him to do is to obey the terms of that amendment as a part of the supreme law of the land. I say to him further that if he and the men or the organization back of him that printed this circular and are promoting its signature throughout the country put so cheap an estimate on the American Congress as to think that its Members would be influenced in the slightest degree by such language and threats as are contained therein, it is time for him and all like him to go back to the countries from which they came. We do not need them nor desire them here. So far as I am concerned, and I think I voice the sentiment of all Members of this House on both sides of this Chamber and on both sides of this question when I say it, I utterly refuse to be coerced or browbeaten or influenced in the slightest degree by any such insulting and scandalous communication as this. If I knew that my seat in Congress depended upon this man's vote, I would resign to-morrow before I would cringe to him or to the organization that is back of him.

And this is not the only instance of attempts to threaten and coerce the Members of this Congress against voting for this legislation. Only two or three weeks ago a widely advertised "demonstration" took place out here on the east front of the Capitol. Metropolitan newspapers all over the country had widely proclaimed that fully 150,000 people would on that occasion march through the streets of Washington and appear on Capitol Hill to show the Congress the strength and extent of the feeling against prohibition.

As on some other occasions, the result did not quite come up to the manifesto. Instead of 150,000 there was a bare 3,000, including musicians, stragglers, and curiosity seekers. This meeting was supposed to be a "monster demonstration" of the laboring interests of the country in protest against national prohibition. Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation, undertook to speak for 3,000,000 members of organized labor in this country. I deny that in what he said he did in fact represent anything like 3,000,000 members of union labor in this country. What he undoubtedly did represent was the unanimous sentiment of all the German brewers in this country, who are, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has said, "trying to hide behind the broad backs of the American workingman, taking advantage of the political unrest which comes at the end of the great war."

One of the speakers at that so-called "monster demonstration," held on the day that gave to the world the flag of the Republic, was a Mrs. Margaret Rooney, who led a delegation of women from Baltimore, claiming that they were advocates of the Personal Liberty League. You heard what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] said the other day in his eloquent description of what she said and did, how she jumped upon the speaker's table and, waving her arms, yelled out, "I am the first woman to advocate personal liberty in this cause, and you can bet your life we'll go to hell to get it."

I do not care to take up the time of the House to comment further upon these various exhibitions or attempts to intimidate the Members of this House. I will simply say that it ill becomes any man while such things are going on before our faces and eyes to confine his criticism and his sarcasm to the activities of the Anti-Saloon League.

It is objected that we have no power to provide for the enforcement of war-time prohibition by defining "intoxicating liquor" as being any liquor containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. The contention is made by the minority of the committee in its report that this is extending the provisions of that act so as to include beverages which are not in fact intoxicating. This position, in my judgment, is not sound. In connection with its use of the term "intoxicating liquor" it would seem to be too clear for argument that Congress possessed the power to define the meaning of the term so used. As a matter of fact, more than 30 States in this Union have already put a legislative construction upon it, either by laying a heavy tax upon it or by making it subject to the prohibitions of statute law. And even the National Government itself has for many years imposed a tax upon all alcoholic liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol, thus putting a practical construction upon this phrase "intoxicating liquors" and recognizing this percentage as marking a clear distinction between liquor that is intoxicating and liquor that is nonintoxicating.

The subject matter of war-time prohibition was within the control of Congress under the war powers in the Constitution, and the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that when a State or the Federal Government has authority over any subject matter, such authority carries with it the power to enact any law having a reasonable relation to the end sought by the original authorized act.

In considering the contention of the minority of the committee that in this proposed legislation Congress has in fact gone beyond its powers under the Constitution, two facts should be borne in mind:

1. The ultimate end and object sought by this legislation is not the possession nor the sale of intoxicating liquor but is the consumption of it. That is the evil we are trying to reach and eradicate. This is recognized by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals (219 Fed. Rep., 794), where, in sustaining the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon law, it said:

"In trying to comprehend the legislative purpose in prohibition statutes, it is important to remember that the ultimate end sought in prohibition legislation is not the prevention or restriction of the mere sale of intoxicants but the prevention of their consumption as a beverage."

2. It is notoriously true that whenever and wherever legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicants is sought to be enforced, every trick, fraud, artifice, and subterfuge that the mind of man can conceive or invent is bound to be used as it has always been used under such circumstances to circumvent the law and render its restrictive provisions null and void and of no effect. Everybody knows this, and our courts have taken judicial notice of it. My understanding is that Congress has full power to adopt any measure or means that it shall consider necessary or convenient in order to make this prohibition effective. All that is necessary is that the means or measures provided shall have some reasonable relation to the end sought, and not be purely arbitrary.

Justice McReynolds, in rendering the opinion in Crane v. Campbell (245 U. S., 304), said:

"And, considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary and unreasonable or without proper relation to the legitimate legislative purpose."

In a comparatively recent case, Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch (226 U. S., 192), the court said:

"When a State, exerting its recognized authority, undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the Government."

Again, in the case of Hoke v. Smith (227 U. S., 309), the court uses the following language:

"Congress may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of a police regulation."

As long as the means or measures adopted by Congress to enforce the legislation are not purely arbitrary, but do, in fact, have some proper relation to the legislative purpose, I feel reasonably confident that they would be upheld by our courts.

I have not had opportunity to examine the decisions carefully, but it is my understanding that such measures as are challenged in this bill as being beyond the power of the legislative authority to enact have already been sustained by the courts of very many of our States, and even by the Supreme Court of the United States itself.

The old argument used to be "prohibition won't prohibit." For a long time I was inclined to put considerable stock in that argument. I had seen prohibition in operation in my own State for a number of years after I became an active practitioner at the bar. Public sentiment at that time did not seem to sustain the law, and it was replaced by local-option statutes in 1903. Thereafter for about 15 years our people lived under a system of strict regulation. We had a good law. In my opinion, it was one of the best regulatory statutes in the country. It served, in my opinion, a very useful purpose. It helped tremendously to educate a sound and sensible public opinion in our State with reference to this question. On May 1, 1918, our present prohibitory law went into effect. We have thereafter had opportunity to judge of its practical working over a period of something more than a year, as compared with a like period under local option.

I submit herewith a table showing the total number of arrests for drunkenness in the eight license cities of our State during the first year under prohibition and the last year under license. They show a total of 1,881 arrests for drunkenness in the first year of prohibition as against a total of 8,170 such arrests during the last full year under license. This is a decrease of more than 76 per cent. From the last report of our State board of charities and correction for the biennial period ending August 31, 1918, I quote the following:

"The prohibitory law has had the immediate effect of depleting both jails, where with one exception—Hillsborough County—prisoners are kept in idleness, and the houses of correction, and certainly has deprived the commissioners of one valuable asset—farm labor during the summer months. Such deprivation can not be deplored if rigid enforcement of the liquor law means a restoration of useful labor in the community, support of the family, integrity of the home, prevention of pauperism, crime, insanity, and feeble-mindedness. If these results are really at tained by the recent liquor legislation, gladly should the counties increase their pay rolls by a few dollars. A slightly increased cost per capita of maintenance at the several county farms would be easily discounted by human wreckage saved. Time alone can determine the ultimate result. Judging from immediate consequences, the experiment seems well worth the trial."

Again, in the same report, I find the following statement:

"The prohibition law went into effect May 1, 1918; for the first eight months, up to May 1, the commitments averaged over 99 per month; for the remaining four months the commitments averaged 40 per month. The inference is too obvious to require comment."

I quote also from a recent statement made by Gov. John H. Bartlett:

"Conditions have been so much better under prohibition than under license that many former believers in license are now outspoken for prohibition. We confidently expect even better results after July 1."

New Hampshire has for many years been interested in this proposal for national constitutional prohibition. On December 27, 1876, Hon. Henry W. Blair, then a Representative in Congress from our State and later for 12 years a distinguished Member of the United States Senate, introduced in this House a resolution providing for national prohibition through amendment to the Constitution. This is believed to have been the first resolution of this character ever introduced in the American Congress. A short time ago Senator Blair, who is still living in the city of Washington at an advanced age although mentally as alert as ever, wrote a letter to the Washington Star, setting forth his connection with this legislation. The letter states in Senator Blair's own words many facts of historic interest, and under leave granted me by the House I herewith incorporate it in extension of my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, we have suppressed the lottery business, we have suppressed the sale of impure foods, we have put an end to white-slave traffic in this country. Why? Because we became convinced that they were one and all harmful to society. We thought that no citizen or group of citizens should be allowed to profit at the expense of society as a whole. And now, acting on precisely the same principle, we have written prohibition into the national statutes for the period of the war and thereafter until demobilization has been completed. We have gone further, and we have written it into the Constitution of the United States. It is a part of the Constitution of the United States to-day, and will be effective after January 1. We have done this because, in my opinion, the people are satisfied that is the most effective, if not the only effective, way to deal with this gigantic evil. I do not expect that it will bring on the millenium, but I do expect that it will operate generally throughout the country in much the same way that it has operated in the last year in my own State and in much the same way as I understand it has operated in most of the 32 States in which it is now in force. I expect that it will materially lessen the population of jails, reformatories, and houses of correction. I expect it will considerably lessen the business of the criminal courts. I think it will mean throughout the country generally as it has meant in my own State—better clothes and shoes for wife and mother and children, a more self-respecting, self-reliant, and efficient citizenship, happier homes, and, in general, a more contented and prosperous people.

MR. BLAIR'S LETTER.

"To the Editor of the Star:

"In the Star recently, referring to the prohibitory amendment, its authorship as the first measure of its kind introduced in Congress is properly attributed to me.

"But there is this further statement: Prohibition as a national issue was known during the session of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars in the State of New York in the year 1869. I never saw or knew of the proceedings of that lodge, or of any conception of removing the liquor traffic or any part of it from the control of the States and placing it in the hands of the Nation, which is the gist and object of the national prohibitory amendment in the mind of any person whatever but my own, which was framed in the years 1875–76 and introduced by me in the House of Representatives December 27, 1876. Then, for the first time, 'prohibition' in any true sense became a national issue. The National Temperance Society of New York may have been an outgrowth of the proceedings of the grand lodge referred to, but its work has been mainly the creation of a temperance literature, which they have magnificently performed.

POWER OF STATES NOT ASSAILED.

"George N. Stearns was its great secretary, and Mr. Dodge, a merchant prince of New York, its patron and president. They never assailed the power of the States to absolutely control the traffic to my knowledge. They filed a petition for an investigation. I helped it all I could. Nothing resulted. But the main question was not one of degree, whether of distilled only or of all intoxicating drugs, but shall the Constitution be so amended as to give the Nation control, and if successful against distilled liquors subsequent and more inclusive amendments might logically follow. In this form it continued until 1884, when Miss Willard, Mr. Stearns, and myself agreed upon the form, including fermented liquors, in which it is now ratified—that is, substantially the form introduced and championed by Senator SHEPPARD, now made the national law by the blessing of Almighty God inspiring the marvelous work of great men and women culminating in this generation.

"And there are still serving some of those who started out and have persevered on this weary pilgrimage from the city of destruction through the valley of the shadow of death to the delectable mountains, more than 40 years ago. But two generations of working life are already passed over the river.

"This amendment will lead directly to a higher civilization for our States, our country, and our world. I introduced and pushed the amendment for 18 years—my whole congressional life—and every year ever since, so that in a feeble way I still pursue the triumph and partake the gale with the rest.

HOW THE AMENDMENT ORIGINATED.

"The amendment originated thus. It will always be a matter of historic interest:

"New Hampshire then had her political conventions the first of each year, campaigned all winter in the snow, and held her elections the first Tuesday of March, including Members of Congress. She was called the 'Finger State,' forecasting the result of the fall elections throughout the country. The very ablest men of both parties fought there for votes as for souls in every yearly campaign.

"New Hampshire was Democratic in the year 1874, with the people, the legislature, State judiciary, governor, and three Democratic Members of Congress, and seemed absolutely sure to cast five votes in the electoral college for Tilden, who was likely to be the Democratic candidate in 1876. The South could no longer be relied upon for Republican majorities, as the result proved. My old third district was not only Democratic, but badly split besides.

"There was no other chance but to carry my district, for the rest of the State and the two other districts were still more hopeless, and we should certainly 'lose the fruits of the war' if we did not carry my district, which seemed impossible.

"I was a disabled soldier, had wounds, and so forth, and, thank God, lots of friends. So had Col. Kent, my rival, leader of the split and a former Republican, all but the actual wounds. We had stumped together as Republicans. He was a gentleman and had done much for his country in the war. I had stumped the district for others at least for nine successive years. I felt forced to take the nomination, and did.

ATTEMPTS TO DISSUADE HIM.

"Senator William E. Chandler and I were friends. We kept him on the national committee, of which he was a most efficient secretary. He was at Washington and did not believe it possible to carry New Hampshire. When he learned that I had accepted the nomination he at once sent for me to meet him at the Fifth Avenue Hotel the next morning.

"Both made night trips, and our interview was most earnest. He said that to attempt to carry the district would ruin me financially and break down my apparently improving health. He said all he could, and I couldn't help being affected by this interview. But I knew what the war and the results of the war meant, and I told him that I must make the fight and do the best I could. He said I could make a few speeches for form's sake, since I had taken the nomination, but that the thing to do was to save the check lists for another year. That he would not permit the waste of the national funds in his own State, and he would not help ruin me. He was very emphatic. So we parted.

"I never made or knew another such campaign. Both sides then conscientiously used money corruptly, so intense were the hates of the war then still existing, but now all so happily merged in a new and higher patriotism. I would not do this. But I begged and borrowed all I could and paid the absent voters their expenses, which was considered both right and lawful. I paid the expenses of about 50 voters in a single town of 2,000 people and am in debt for some of it now, and have been ever since. I was all the time, except Sundays, on the stump, plowing through great drifts of snow, beaten by storms and often shaking from chills, from which I suffered.

WHEN HE FEARED DEFEAT.

"Well along in the campaign I feared I was beaten sure. We elected State officers by majority over all and had to get the legislature and governor to turn out the Democrats, who had possession of our State. The United States Senators were inactive.

"We had a little temperance party of a thousand or two which often held the balance of power. They were really God's elect, but generally helped the Democrats, because the Republicans were a few hundred the most numerous in the State. The older ones bossed things. But several of the young ministers and friends led by them rebelled and voted for me without asking any pledges whatever—they just trusted me man fashion—and I was elected by 162 votes.

"Of course, these men wanted no money nor reward of any kind. But I knew who elected me. Aunt Fannie was worried almost to distraction lest I be defeated, but when she met me the last Saturday night before the home grapple at the polls the next Tuesday she was singing like a lark, so to speak. Aunt Fannie had direct intercourse all her life with some Being on high, and knew what was coming. She didn't worry about the election any more. But we worked right on and kept the district red hot under the snow.

"It is only fair to say that the enthusiasm in my district helped greatly to arouse the two other districts, although we lost them, but we gained in the legislature and elected Gov. Cheney by it, and that gave us, by preventing the contemplated Democratic fatal gerrymander of the State senatorial districts, our necessary legislation and the five presidential electors who elected Hayes over Tilden via the electoral commission in 1876. If I had not carried my district Tilden would have been elected over Hayes by four undisputed votes in the Electoral College—probably many more.

VITAL PART OF HISTORY.

"This vital part of our political history has never been half told. It is high time to do it. The records prove it. New Hamphire deserves it. Our national leaders well knew that the State was lost in 1876 if I failed to carry my district in 1875.

"I said that Aunt Fannie knew the result before the rest of us. But Col. Kent and I went over the returns with William Butterfield, Democratic secretary of state, and found out that her information was correct. I'm a little superstitious.

"The young ministers didn't say a word to me—kept on praying, I suppose.

"Well, I thought it over for months. I knew that something done for temperance would suit them best of anything, and perhaps the Almighty God also, but what to do and how to do it without hurting the party was a poser, and I could not discuss it with party friends, for it would get out and I would be in hot water and perhaps not have pluck enough to do anything at all, and if I found out that I was a coward I could not live long with myself.

"Then I would think how manly those young ministers had been, and I thought I ought to be as much of a man as a minister is, anyway. Besides, I was of a temperance race, rather, myself. I had been county prosecuting officer before the war and knew what a farce mere State prohibition is, even of the Neal Dow order, and I never had thought or heard of any national connection with the traffic any more than in the transportation of other 'goods, wares, and merchandise.' It was the business of the States, the demand was everywhere, and any single State, Territory, or the District of Columbia could supply the whole for home consumption and exportation.

COMES TO HIM AS A VISION.

"Finally, one day while gazing up the Pemigewassett Valley to the mountains the whole thing flashed into my mind like a vision. I soon made a record of it almost word for word as originally impressed upon my mind. I concealed it from everyone until I arrived in New York, where I showed it confidentially to George N. Stearns, secretary of the National Temperance Society, and his able assistant.

"To them the idea of placing the traffic under the national power seemed new and puzzling, and my proposed amendment entirely new and strange to them both. They neither approved nor opposed; they would think it over. I insisted on secrecy until I actually introduced it.

"Mr. Stearns published the amendment and the speech accompanying and always stood by it after he had full opportunity to examine it; and so of his able assistant.

"The original amendment and comprehensive speech will be found in the record of House of Representatives, December, 1876—its second section greatly enlarged the power of the States to prohibit also.

"I never heard of any claim to the suggestion of prohibition by the Nation until recently. In fact, I found it to be exceedingly unpopular for many years. The Good Templars were a powerful and secret organization, and individuals may have discussed all conceivable methods of State or National action, and the right of petition is universal. Certainly nothing tangible was ever done, if thought of.

"The Norsemen discovered America before Columbus did, but America didn't stay discovered, so that it has turned out that Columbus discovered, as an incident to his discovery of America, the Norsemen themselves; and but for Columbus (or some other real discoverer) the Norsemen would not suspect that there was now or ever had been any such place as America at all.

POINTS TO PRACTICAL FAILURES.

"As you will say, there was the Washingtonian movement and much agitation upon the subject of temperance before the national prohibitory movement was begun by me, but it is hardly too much to say that all had practically failed, not even excepting the Maine law itself. Something new had to be done. There was the old Congressional Temperance Society. Rev. Dr. Chickering had the book. Daniel Webster, I think, and many of the great temperance leaders of that day belonged to it, and so did I. I have Father Mathews's silver banner presented to him by the ladies of Cork, blessed by the Pope and borne at the head of temperance processions in our own country.

"But all this is trifling now. An armistice is a great victory for the foe. Let us "go over the top" with the needed prohibitory amendments covering all harmful drugs and substances, and perfect the constitutions of the whole world. Now is the accepted time!

"HENRY W. BLAIR."

Decrease, 76+ per cent.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing, at least in part, a speech I made on the subject of prohibition in the District of Columbia on the 26th day of May, 1908. I was then the pioneer of the movement in the District of Columbia. I want to republish this speech simply to show conditions then as compared with conditions that now exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this was a good many years ago that the gentleman made this speech.

Mr. SIMS. Eleven years ago the 26th of May.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was then a new and bucolic Member of this House?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I have been here now almost 23 years. I was not then a new Member.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask whether he holds the same views now in this year of our Lord 1919 that he entertained away back yonder when he was a new Member of the House in 1908.

Mr. SIMS. But I was not a new Member then.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know whether the gentleman entertains the same view now that he held then. He has not answered the question.

Mr. SIMS. The speech will show.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman changed his front upon the subject?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I do not object.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to know what position the gentleman took in that speech.

Mr. SIMS. I made a speech in favor of prohibition in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Then I object.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in the half minute I want to say that Admiral Sims in a public speech within a month——

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman refer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] who has just taken his seat?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I said Admiral Sims.

Mr. GALLIVAN. A real admiral.

Mr. SIMS. A member of the Sims family.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That Admiral Sims, who did such wonderful work in the late war, said he was proud of England, because England would not deny to its citizens personal liberty, and I think Admiral Sims——

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman from Massachusetts feel about England himself? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the best thing I have heard about England in a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my judgment, goes beyond any legal or legitimate interpretation of the prohibition amendment. If the prohibition amendment is held to be legally adopted by the Supreme Court, every Member of Congress is bound by his oath of office to vote for a law to make it effective. But the attempt to pass a law to bar from manufacture, sale, and use the beverages held by reliable medical experts and by high-class judges to be nonintoxicants is not only unprecedented but unfair.

I am just in receipt of a prominent daily Ohio journal containing a leading editorial against the drastic features of the pending bill, of which the following is an extract:

> It seems that the insane proposition that a beverage containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating is calculated to destroy the grape industry of the country, notwithstanding grape juice is the beverage most approved by prohibitionists, except water, including the approval of that preeminent exponent of the faith, William J. Bryan, who will have to go without grape juice or drink slops, if the contention referred to is sustained by Congress and the courts.

A PLEA FOR THE ISLANDERS OF LAKE ERIE.

My most valued constituents are the grape growers of those emerald isles—North Bass, Middle Bass, and Put in Bay, on the south shore of Lake Erie. These islands are devoted almost exclusively to grape culture. This bill if enacted into law will pauperize and ruin these islanders. Their grape-growing acres will be rendered practically valueless, and the islands, now peopled by an industrious, wholesome and moral people, among whom intoxication is practically unknown, will be literally robbed of their possessions by a law of Congress. I would be wanting in fidelity to my trust as the representative of these islanders if I did not arise on this floor and protest against such uncalled for and wicked legislation as this bill proposes.

The Hon. George F. Lonz, one of our leading grape growers of the islands, a member of the Ohio legislature, writes as follows:

> In going over Government reports of analyses made on fresh pressed grape juice under the most favorable conditions, an alcoholic percentage was found which exceeded even 1 per cent, and in many cases exceeded 1½ per cent.

Mr. Lonz declares that a small percentage of alcohol is unavoidable where grapes are pressed properly.

THE GRAPE JUICE INDUSTRY WILL BE RUINED.

Col. William Jennings Bryan, now the leading and the most eloquent champion of prohibition, has in the past recommended grape juice as a wholesome and satisfying beverage—a substitute for beer and intoxicants. On several occasions, when traveling I have ordered in a Pullman dining car a bottle of this wholesome beverage. Yet should this bill become a law, it would be a criminal offense to manufacture, bottle, or sell this mild and comforting nonintoxicant, indorsed by the foremost champion of prohibition.

I remember a holding made by the professor of chemistry of the University of Iowa (a recognized authority), that bottled grape juice contains more than 2¾ per cent of alcohol. The testimony of other experts of practical experience is that in order to preserve grape juice as a tonic beverage, it requires (if not for speedy use) from 1½ to 2½ per cent of alcohol.

A REAL TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE.

I have been a temperance man since I shed my pantalettes, over 75 years ago. I have never had occasion to use either vinous or spirituous liquors, either in war or peace, or in political campaigns. I do not know a Manhattan cocktail from a segregated moonshine seismometer, now doing a sizzing business in prohibition Georgia. I have never had a cigarette or a particle of tobacco in my mouth, and I never chewed gum. I do not mention these matters to claim any of the abstemious virtues, but as convincing evidence that I have a temperance record, tested longer by experience and age than any of these self-glorifying regnants responsible for this bill.

CAN NOT ENFORCE AN UNRIGHTEOUS LAW.

I do not believe you can make either men or women good by either law or force, but you can make men bad by law and force. I believe in Jeffersonian democracy—that all legislation should be enacted to promote the greatest good to the greatest number. I do not believe in enacting legislation to deprive whole communities of the right of self-government in order to promote the weal of a minority of mental and physical degenerates. It has been fully demonstrated by the experience of nations across the Atlantic, and more recently in our own United States, that this class of conscienceless irresponsibles when denied intoxicants have almost invariably become "dope fiends." We remember during the closing days of the last Congress that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the present distinguished chairman of the Military Committee of this House, stated that the recent draft of soldiers for the World War developed the fact that 81,000 young men of draft age were found unfit for military duty by our medical examiners because addicted not to the liquor habit but to the drug habit. This statement, to my knowledge, has never been contradicted. It has been numerously intimated that this large class of degenerates were found largely in States legally dry.

DOPE FIENDS, HOW MADE.

Since the adoption of prohibition in so many of the Southern and Western States the illegitimate consumption of opium has increased so rapidly that now we are consuming more than ten times as much opium as any other country in the world, with the possible exception of China. I quote a vital extract from the report of the narcotic committee of medical experts:

> A comparison of the per capita consumption of opium in this country with that of other countries indicates that this country consumes from thirteen to seventy-two times as much opium per capita as is consumed by any other country.

It is clearly evident that if partial prohibition has resulted in such a startling increase of dope fiends, universal prohibition will be still more startling and degrading. In the presence of these deplorable conditions, it is the duty of every sane and patriotic citizen to pause and ponder over the moral crisis that confronts the country. Do not forget that it is the well-considered and deliberate opinion of the Allied Medical Association of America that prohibition will increase the number of opium addicts in the United States and that mild wines and beer will minimize that danger.

THE TRAFFIC IN NARCOTIC DRUGS.

On March 25, 1918, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed a committee of able and widely experienced gentlemen to investigate the traffic in narcotic drugs in the United States. The following-named persons comprised the membership of that committee: Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, Member of this House; Dr. Reid Hunt, professor of pharmacology, of Harvard University; Mr. B. S. Keith, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States; and Dr. A. G. Du Mez, of the United States Public Health Service. After a thorough investigation, lasting over one year, this committee made a report, which is now on file in the Treasury Department, in which they estimate that there are to-day in this country more than 1,000,000 opium addicts, and that these unfortunates are expending annually more than $61,000,000 for this drug. And they find that prohibition is one of the principal causes of opium addiction, and upon this subject the committee in its report said:

> The consensus of opinion of those interested in the subject appears to be to the effect that the number of addicts will increase as soon as the prohibition laws are enforced. These opinions are based for the most part on the theory that drinkers will seek a substitute for alcohol, and that the opiates and cocaine will be found to be the most satisfactory for that purpose. This opinion apparently receives some support from investigations made in some of the Southern States where prohibition has been in effect for some years.

MEDICAL EXPERTS ON PROHIBITION.

I submit in addition some further valuable information from the able address of Congressman NEWTON on the floor of the House July 10:

> Dr. John Marshall, of Pennsylvania, who for more than 20 years has been a professor of chemistry and toxicology in the Medical School in the University of Pennsylvania, who has studied in the greatest medical schools in this country and in Europe, while testifying upon this subject, declared that wine and beer containing two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight are not intoxicating. After detailing long and extensive experiments, which he had made for the purpose of determining the effect of alcohol upon the human body, he said:

"In view of the foregoing I consider that beer with an alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight is not an intoxicating beverage."

Dr. William J. Geis, formerly an instructor in the scientific department of Yale University, and now a professor of biological chemistry in the School of Medicine of Columbia University, who for years has studied the effects of alcohol upon the human body, while testifying upon this subject and after detailing at great length the results of his experiments and study, said:

"I am, therefore, of the opinion that beer of alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent by weight is not an intoxicating beverage."

Dr. Hobart A. Hare, a professor of therapeutics, materia medica, and diagnosis of the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia, and who for 28 years has been a visiting physician at the Jefferson Hospital and other hospitals in Pennsylvania, after more than 30 years of study and experiment with respect to the effect of alcohol upon the human body, while under oath stated:

"From my personal experience and observation and consideration of the literature on the subject, I am of the opinion that beer containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating."

It is a question of fact to be determined by medical experts. And here I submit the opinion of the highest medical and scientific experts in the United States:

Dr. Stephen P. Jewett, a graduate of Clark University, of Massachusetts, and of Buffalo University Medical School, who has served as an interne in the Metropolitan Hospital on Blackwells Island, resident physician at the River Crest Sanitarium at Astoria, Long Island, and who for the past three years has been the physician in charge of the alcoholic wards of Bellevue Hospital in New York City, a noted writer upon alcoholism and drug addiction, while testifying under oath, said:

During all my experience at the various institutions and hospitals with which I have been connected, both as interne and as physician, I have never known of any case of a person being admitted to such institutions suffering from alcoholism where such condition had been produced because of the drinking of beer. From my personal experience and from observations and researches made by me, I am of the opinion that beer or any beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating.

Dr. Frank A. McGuire, who graduated from the medical department of New York University, who for eight years was assistant attending physician in the Demilt Dispensary in New York City, who for the past 15 years has been visiting physician at the New York City prison, as well qualified by experience and observation to know the effect of alcohol upon the human system as any other man in this country, while testifying upon this subject said:

I have come in contact during my practice with over 25,000 cases in which the effect of alcohol was an element. In my opinion as a physician, which is based especially upon my long experience in dealing with cases of inebriation, I am of the opinion that the beer now made, and which contains not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, is not intoxicating.

Dr. Moses Keschner, a practicing physician, residing in the borough of Manhattan, a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York and an interne at the health department of New York City, who has been a visiting physician at the department of correction of New York City, who was a physician at the penitentiary in Kings County, N. Y., and Manhattan City Prison, and who has had extensive opportunity to study the effect of alcohol, while testifying upon this subject said:

In the city prison of Brooklyn I see about 2,000 patients a year suffering from some phase of alcoholism. It has been a part of my duty to treat these cases, and as part of my diagnosis I have to ascertain what the patient has been drinking. Since the advent of beer, which is now made and which contains, as I am informed and verily believe, not to exceed 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight, I have not found a single case of intoxication from such beer. From my study, investigation, and personal experience I am of the opinion that such beer is not intoxicating.

THE RUTHLESS DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY.

The Hon. CLARENCE F. LEA, of the first district of California, stated on the floor of the House that there is to-day a grape crop on the vines in California the value of which is estimated by the viticultural commission at $12,000,000. If this Congress should adopt section 1 of this act, it will prevent the farmers of California from using these $12,000,000 of grapes that now hang upon the vines. The grape industry is one of its own peculiar kind for this reason: It takes four years to raise a grapevine to the productive age. The cost of raising resistant stock from which dry wines are largely produced is from $250 to $300 an acre. It will cost the farmers of California alone over $2,000,000 to dig up the vines devoted to the dry-wine industry when prohibition goes into effect.

MORE GREEDY PARASITES ON THE BODY POLITIC.

The numerous lobby of professional prohibitionists now dominating the majority of this House are intelligent and inordinately industrious. They know the attitude of the scientific medical experts of the United States on this vital subject. And yet they have no testimony to offer in rebuttal; neither have any of their representatives on this floor. They are relying solely upon a denunciation of the saloon and the so-called liquor interests, when neither the saloon nor the liquor interests are legitimately involved. The sole issue is whether Congress shall enact a law to prohibit and penalize the dealers and users of nonintoxicating beverages, when no such action is provided or contemplated in the prohibition amendment to the Constitution.

Let us consider the most vital element of this experiment in occult sociology now demanding the passage of this bill. To our overburdened taxpayers it means more burdens, more greedy parasites on the body politic, more unrest among the stalwart men of the shops and mines and fields who do the world's work.

The well-informed and alert chairman of the Military Committee of this House estimates that the destruction of property that this bill will cause, if enacted, will reach over one thousand million dollars. This in addition to the loss of funds from internal-revenue taxes; with a further drain on the Federal Treasury for the proposed "Commission of Prohibition"; and a great standing Army with petty enforcement officers that is inevitable to the enforcement of the prohibition amendment in all communities where public opinion is adverse. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, now 15 years in Congress and a thorough student of civics, made the following estimate of the loss of revenue to the Government should this bill pass Congress. I quote:

Mr. Chairman, I wish to put into the RECORD the result of some inquiries made at the Internal Revenue Office with regard to the financial effect of the prohibitory law. This is a matter of serious consequence to the taxpayers of the country, and is having the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means with respect to revenue production.

I find that for the 10 months up to and including April of the last fiscal year we collected from wines, distilled spirits, and other intoxicating beverages $408,274,000. The estimated receipts for May and June to complete the fiscal year brings the total up to $533,000,000. In addition to that sum the Treasury gained heavily from income and excess-profits taxes arising from the liquor business. That was under the old laws. If prohibition were not in effect, we would under the new revenue law receive for the six months, from June 30 to December 30, 1919, approximately $325,000,000. For the whole fiscal year ending June 30 next our receipts without prohibition would be $638,000,000. In addition we would receive income tax and excess-profits taxes sufficient to bring the grand total up to $1,000,000,000. This revenue, which is fully three times as much as we can possibly receive from the tariff, is now gone. This loss of revenue presents a problem which may ultimately call for the issue of additional bonds.

ORGANIZED LABOR AGAINST PROHIBITION LEGISLATION.

The organized labor of the United States, in national convention assembled, passed a resolution almost unanimously against prohibition. In my district the organized workers of Toledo, Ohio, about 23,000 strong, with some 91 locals, have passed almost unanimously resolutions against prohibition.

Labor as applied to the shops and mines and fields produces all wealth. Labor is more vitally interested in this question than the very sleek, well-groomed lobbyists and persuasive gentlemen now pushing this destructive bill.

THE HAVOC OF WAR.

It is estimated that the Old World War has destroyed property of the value of $186,000,000,000. Of this staggering total the United States has in property and money lost some $22,000,000,000, all to be paid by taxation. This amount is larger than the total value of all the property in the State of New York, by far the richest and most populous State in the Union. As this vast sum must be paid eventually by the wageworkers they have a deeper interest in this question than all the idlers and plutocrats and pretentious prophets, and their voice of earnest protest against this unauthorized legislation should have serious consideration.

CHARGE OF BAD FAITH.

The authors of this pending bill are not acting in good faith in forcing prohibition legislation now. Attention was only a few days ago called to this fact by the able gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], that the leading prohibitionists promised the brewers and grape farmers and others having large property holdings one year to adjust their business. This they deny now. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 17, 1917:

While we prohibitionists desire to have the country go dry, we do not propose to let our zeal in that great cause destroy our sense of justice, and I for one was willing to advocate the right of the brewers and distillers to have one year to wind up their business. We have distinguished precedents for this in the action of nearly all the dry States. Most of the States have given them a year in which they may wind up their business. * * * I think it is a perfectly fair amendment, and I will be very glad to vote for it, and I hope the dry Members will vote for it.

PROHIBITION DOES NOT PROHIBIT.

It has been demonstrated by over a quarter of a century of practical test, notably in the State of Maine, that prohibition has not lessened divorce or crime or drunkenness. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], several times mayor of Boston, stated on this floor only a few hours ago that prohibition Maine, lying alongside of licensed Massachusetts, has as much or more crime and more law violations, as much consumption of beverages that intoxicate, comparing equal populations. And another distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN, of classic Boston, called attention to the undisputed fact that there has been a large increase in crime in this National Capital since Congress voted Washington dry. I quote:

Do you know what has happened up to this time in the way of crime since you made Washington dry without giving the people of Washington a chance to say whether they wanted it to go dry or not? Let me give you a few figures:

"A recent grand jury in this District found 107 new indictments, which, added to the 80 other true bills previously reported, made 187 criminal indictments for this District in one week. United States District Attorney Laskey is quoted as having said that no grand jury since he has been in office has ever returned so many indictments against violators of the criminal law."

In the Evening Times, of Washington, a few evenings since I found the following illuminating item:

THIRTY-FIVE "DRUNKS" ARRESTED IN DRY WASHINGTON.

More than 35 cases of intoxication were recorded on the police-court blotter to-day. This is the largest number which has been in court since July 1. Twenty-six persons were locked up, while the others forfeited collateral of $50.

And this item only reports the drunkards officially reported. Those not reported to police probably numbered three times as many.

THE BILL IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

I claim the Congress has no power under the prohibition amendment (the eighteenth) to declare that a certain beverage or tonic is intoxicating when it is not. In fact Congress has no right to legislate a continental lie into a law. Furthermore, as has already been lucidly stated by a leading member of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. GARD of Ohio:

Congress has no right under the war power to write something into the law not contemplated by anyone when the law was enacted. Furthermore, Congress has no power to amend or reenact a war measure after the war has ceased.

The war is over both actually and officially. Congress, in many legislative acts during the past seven months, has so declared on many notable occasions.

On May 20 last, in his message to Congress, the President said:

The demobilization of the military forces has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and beers.

There are some very sensible citizens well equipped with mature judgment who are not constitutional lawyers. Here is a cognate specimen:

No man with candid intelligence can rise here and say that Congress now has a fair, legitimate right to impose war prohibition upon this country. War prohibition presupposes a war. The only right Congress has to enact prohibition before the Federal amendment goes into effect is the war power of Congress as based upon the necessity of war. War prohibition, to go into effect after a war, is a fraud upon the face of it. In its enactment "war prohibition" was a legislative absurdity. And to repeat the offense now that the war is eight months behind would be legislative buffoonery. (Congressman LEA.)

Several sections of the pending bill are not only unauthorized by the prohibition amendment, but are clearly unconstitutional. Congressman MOON of Tennessee, conceded to be one of the ablest lawyers in Congress, who has served in this historic Chamber for 22 years and who voted for the prohibition amendment, holds the bill unconstitutional and a usurpation of individual rights guaranteed to every citizen by the Federal Constitution.

I am on safe ground when I state that Congress has no right, when legislating to enforce an amendment to the Constitution, to go beyond the explicit provisions of that amendment. The eighteenth amendment prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. Any legislation that will be necessary and reasonable to carry out or enforce this provision may be invoked by Congress, but the essential legislation must be fairly implied and directed to the prevention of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. It can not be directed against other and distinct offenses. Congress can not imply by its arbitrary will a power from an express power granted to it that is not essential to enforce the expressed power, nor can it imply an unconstitutional power and exercise it for that purpose. On this question Congressman MOON held, in a carefully prepared speech delivered on the floor of the House, as follows:

Again, the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prevents the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. The question of what "intoxicating liquor" is, within the meaning of this constitutional amendment, must be determined from the usually accepted meaning of these words at the time of the adoption of the amendment. It is a judicial question, one for the courts and not one for the legislative branch of the Government. If Congress can define what "intoxicating liquor" means and determine that any brand of whisky, wine, beer, porter, or ale is intoxicating that contains one-half of 1 per cent alcohol the next Congress, having a similar power, can determine that any beverage containing 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 90 per cent of alcohol would or would not be intoxicating, as no Congress has a right to bind upon matters of legislation a subsequent Congress. The meaning of the fundamental law would thus vary from time to time and would be subject to the caprice and will of a partisan Congress. Congress can not change the meaning of a constitutional power by statute nor add to nor take from it by the use of any words defining what it means. The amendment is self-explanatory. If not, it would be nugatory. The words "intoxicating liquor" must have a fixed and determined judicial significance in the view and light of the meaning of those words at the time of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, else Congress by statute would be constantly changing and making constitutional provisions on the subject. The fundamental law must be stable and fixed; that it should be so was the purpose of passing the amendment. Constitutional law does not vary like statutes.

The above from one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in Congress is not only sound law but saving common sense. No fair lawyer will honestly question this legal and logical interpretation of the prohibition amendment.

I maintain that it is solely a question of fact, whether a certain beverage is intoxicating, to be tried by courts of competent jurisdiction. The State, with its plenary police power, can prohibit the sale of any kind of liquor, whether alcoholic or malt, but the terms of the Federal amendment limit the power of Congress, and we can not go beyond.

Section 7 of this bill makes it unlawful for any person to receive or possess any intoxicating liquor. This is clearly unconstitutional. No such authority is given in the amendment nor can it under any rule of construction be fairly implied from the amendment or any section of the Constitution, since the mere possession of liquor by an individual not engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor is not necessarily a means of preventing the manufacture and sale of liquor.

A PROHIBITION STATESMAN AGAINST THE BILL.

As Judge Moon voted for the prohibition amendment on its passage in the House of Representatives the following extract from his speech on this floor July 11, 1919, is highly instructive and illuminating as to the unauthorized and outrageous features of this bill. I quote:

If a sick man needing stimulation could not reach a doctor, his friend could not give him a drink of liquor without going to prison as a result. If a farmer permits a keg of sweet cider to ferment and contain more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol and did not throw it away immediately on knowledge thereof, he would have to pay fines or have to go to the jail and probably lose his farm, or if a barrel of vinegar, perchance, should by any reason become alcoholic to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent, as sometimes happens, it would have to be disposed of at once, because after it was known by its owner that it contained one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, or if he could have reasonably known it, he would become liable to fine and imprisonment if he retained it. If Congress could at will name anything that it desired to as an intoxicating liquor and prohibit the use of it under this section, it might name sulphur water, ginger ale, or anything else it wanted to as intoxicating liquor, and punish for the manufacture and sale. The question as to whether the beverage is intoxicating or not, as I have stated, is purely one of fact under the law. Some beer, some ale, some porter might be intoxicating or not with more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol in it. In fact, it has been judicially determined in the State of New York that beer with 2.75 per cent of alcohol is nonintoxicating. Certainly beer with 1 per cent of alcohol would be nonintoxicating. Can Congress arbitrarily say that beer with one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating when the fact is not so? If so, then it holds that a nonintoxicating beverage is intoxicating and penalizes the manufacture and sale of it when it only has power to prevent the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

LEGAL ETHICS DISCUSSED.

Laws, to be respected, must be just.

Laws, to be obeyed, must appeal to the conscience and common sense of the average citizen.

You can not make a criminal of a citizen by a law of Congress.

You can not do that legally under the prohibition amendment.

You can not make a criminal of a grape farmer in whose home or possession is found a bottle of wine pressed from his own grapes. You can not make him a criminal without giving him the right to trial before a court of competent jurisdiction and a jury of his peers.

You can not enforce a law that penalizes a farmer who holds a barrel of cider in his cellar pressed from his home-grown apples.

STATISTICS OF GRAPE CULTURE.

The grape industry of the country represents a vast amount of wealth and property and pays enormous sums in taxes into the Federal Treasury—all to be ruthlessly destroyed and lost should this bill become a law.

I submit some figures:

Quantity of wine made in the United States in 1917, 39,625,500 gallons.

Wines produced in the United States.

	Gallons.
1910	50, 684, 343
1911	56, 655, 006
1912	50, 619, 880
1913	48, 683, 849
1914	44, 973, 643
1915	27, 255, 690
1916	42, 229, 206
1917	37, 640, 495

The following figures, furnished by the Department of Agriculture, while only estimates so far as the whole country is concerned, those for California being correct, are believed to be nearly accurate: There are 261,000 acres in the United States devoted to wine grapes, 170,000 acres being in California and the remaining 91,000 throughout the rest of the States. The estimated acreage of grapes throughout the United States is 530,000, 320,000 acres being in California and the remaining 210,000 throughout the rest of the States. (Taken from the World Almanac for 1917.)

The production of wines in the United States in 1915 was as follows:

California:	Gallons.
Sweet	3, 825, 000
Dry	20, 000, 000
New York	1, 250, 000
Ohio	2, 000, 000
Missouri	400, 000
New Jersey	200, 000
Virginia	100, 000
North Carolina	150, 000
Other States	150, 000

There is now general unrest throughout the United States over the high cost of living. Many practical students of economics believe that Congress can provide legislation that will give adequate relief. There are constant conflicts between capital and labor resulting in lockouts and strikes that are impeding general prosperity. The overburdened taxpayers are pleading for relief everywhere, and Congress is urged to enact legislation to relieve business and manufacturers from the onerous burdens. The millions of gallant soldiers returning from the World War are anxiously waiting for a replacement of their places in industry, and pleading for a soldier patriots' reward by a grateful people.

Congress has impending, besides the healing of the wounds of war, reconstruction legislation the greatest this country has ever faced. In the midst of this universal demand for relief, Congress has sidetracked every important and benignant measure for practical and humane legislation, and is wasting its precious time on a measure which, if enacted into national law, will aggravate the general unrest and add enormously to the present onerous taxation, with no compensating benefits, moral, financial, or economic.

In addition to enacting legislation depriving the hungry Federal Treasury of the needed revenue derived from wine and beer, it is proposed to fasten upon the overburdened taxpayers an army of high-salaried officials to enforce prohibition in the States, in conflict with State laws in many States, adding millions more to the burdens of the overly-tired taxpayers.

THE HEROICS OF PUT IN BAY ISLAND.

In conclusion, let me again refer to my industrious and worthy constituents who inhabit those historic islands near the south shore of Lake Erie. Those islands have a peculiar charm for the lover of heroic history. Near Put in Bay Island, 16 miles from shore, on September 10, 106 years ago, Commodore Perry won the greatest naval victory ever fought on fresh water. And near the spot on Put in Bay Island where Commodore Perry landed his heroic band after the battle there stands the most commanding monument in the United States outside this Capital, and I am still enjoying a modest pride that I aided in securing an appropriation of $250,000 by Congress to erect this magnificent and enduring memorial to the greatest naval hero of the nineteenth century.

I plead here that these worthy and patriotic islanders be saved from the despoilment of cruel and unjust laws. A visit to these teeming and historic islands would be a liberal education to that group of one idea idealists who need an enlarged vision and a broader and more humane tolerance of the chartered rights and immunities of American citizens.

Probably I shall be found in the minority on this bill, but I am accustomed to minorities. I remember what Emerson said in the heyday of his career, "Minorities are usually right." And Emerson is conceded the greatest prophet of human destiny America ever produced.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this general subject of prohibition, there has been much said about the views of labor, about the use of beer and wine, and about referendums. Therefore I have thought it might be proper for me for a few moments to call to your attention some matters in the State of Michigan which have transpired that have a bearing upon these questions.

Recently there has been called to the attention of Congress the report of an investigator, said to have been sent to Michigan by one Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, speaking for, among others, the Bartenders' Union, the Bottle Makers' Association, and the Brewery Workers. Mr. Gompers, quoting his unnamed investigator, gives it as his conclusion that the enactment of State-wide prohibition in Michigan, one of the greatest industrial States to adopt prohibition, resulted in the spread of Bolshevism and anarchy.

I have wondered why, if Mr. Gompers was interested in the connection between the use or prohibition of liquors and Bolshevism, he says so little of the land of beer, Germany, where Bolshevism comes very near to controlling the Government, and why he has not made any examination of conditions in the land of wine, France. I hold in my hand a letter which I received yesterday from an American doctor of high standing, now in our military service, who, writing from the camp at Brest, tells me of the very acute demonstration of Bolshevism among the French soldiers and sailors in the land of wine. But rather than go to these lands of beer and wine, where he would find Bolshevism in its active state, he sends this apparently amateur investigator to Michigan, where State-wide prohibition was voted in the election of November, 1916, effective the 1st of May, 1918, and where, notwithstanding that fact, when the last Liberty loan was floated to maintain this Government, the State of Michigan was the first State of all the Union to go over the top. [Applause.]

If there was any State before us, if there is any dispute, it is the State of Iowa that makes the same claim, and the State of Iowa likewise is dry. [Applause.]

More than that, we have had the vote in Michigan in certain cities, the expression of labor, if you please, upon the question of beer and wine. The State went dry in the election of November, 1916, when all male citizens had a chance to vote. The country was not in the war, the boys were home, and then the State voted dry by 70,000. In April, 1919, the State again voted on the question of the sale of liquors, not on the whole subject of prohibition of all liquors, but on the limited subject, the sale of beer and wine. Now, at that time there were some soldier boys away, but it was not the fault of the drys, however, that that election and that referendum came when the soldiers were away. That vote in Michigan was taken in the absence of some soldiers because the wets of Michigan elected to take it then. What was the result of that election?

I contend that labor includes not only men who belong to the bartenders' union or any other union in the Federation of Labor, but every man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow, whether upon the farm or in industry. But I am not going to go that far in the discussion this afternoon. I want to call to your attention what the men in the cities, cities of 10,000 population, said in Michigan on beer and wine after we had State-wide prohibition for nearly a year. Let me give you the official figures, and they are the figures on that question in the most recent referendum in this country on the question of beer and wine, and they show the vote in industrial centers only. Bear in mind for the last few years Michigan cities have, as a rule, probably expanded more industrially than cities of any other State in the country. Now, I have taken the vote of every city, without exception, in Michigan that had a population of 10,000 or more in the last census.

The most of those cities have had a great growth since then, and the vote of those cities is the urban vote of my State. And, I think it may be fairly stated that the urban population of Michigan will roughly constitute the labor vote of Michigan, because in an industrial center the bulk of the vote is the labor vote. Take the city of Adrian, with a population of 10,000; votes for beer and wine, 1,600—I do not give the odd figures—and 2,500 against. Alpena, 1,000 for beer and wine and 1,900 against. Ann Arbor, for beer and wine, 2,000; against, 4,000. Battle Creek, for beer and wine, 3,500; against, 5,500. Bay City, for beer and wine, 4,000; against, 7,000, and Bay City was formerly considered one of the wet places of Michigan. [Applause.] Detroit—and anyone interested in the beer and wine end of it wants to be ready to applaud now, because it is the only real hope he will find in Michigan—Detroit, with her large foreign population, a large number of those men who have not yet learned that when they come to America they must bow to American ideals and live in the American ways of decency—Detroit, 87,800 for beer and wine and 53,205 against. The city has about a million population now and had only 465,766 in 1910. Escanaba, 2,019 for beer and wine and 2,040 against. Flint, which but a few years ago, in the census of 1910, had a population of only 38,000 and now has nearly 100,000—that new industrial city that had been dry for several years by county option voted 4,670 for beer and wine and 8,914 against. [Applause.] Grand Rapids, the second city in the State, a great industrial city in the manufacture of furniture and other articles of legitimate commerce, voted 11,260 for beer and wine and 24,706 against. [Applause.]

Highland Park, which is a village located in the midst of the city of Detroit, surrounded entirely by the territory of Detroit, but separate in its government, and where the Ford automobile is made, which had only 4,120 of population in 1910 but now has over 30,000, went 2,931 for beer and wine and 5,800 against; Holland, 814 for beer and wine and 1,900 against; Ironwood, 1,430 for, 2,061 against; Ishpeming, 1,012 for, 2,187 against. That is one of the mining cities of the upper peninsula. Jackson, another automobile center, 6,918 for beer and wine, 12,755 against; Kalamazoo, 4,076 for beer and wine, 8,841 against; Lansing, the capital city, and a great automobile center, manufacturing the Reo and the Oldsmobile, 5,031 for beer and wine, 10,165 against; Manistee, 2,328 for beer and wine, 3,660 against; Marquette, 1,164 for beer and wine, 2,000 against; Menominee—and here was the only help and encouragement that Detroit had in the whole State—2,775 for beer and wine, 2,638 against, a majority of 137 for beer and wine. Muskegon, 3,407 for beer and wine, 4,722 against; Pontiac, another automobile center, 2,006 for beer and wine, 4,113 against; Port Huron, 2,079 for beer and wine, 4,036 against. That is the chief city in my own district, where but a few years ago the county gave a majority of 2,500 against local option. Now it—the chief city of the county—votes against even beer and wine. Saginaw—and I may say that there was a time when we thought Saginaw was the wettest place on earth—6,302 for beer and wine, and 8,049 against; Sault Ste. Marie, 1,076 for beer and wine, 1,947 against; Traverse City, 662 for beer and wine, 1,796 against. Altogether there were 162,324 votes in the State of Michigan for beer and wine only, and there were 187,284 against. [Applause.]

The following table gives the vote above referred to, together with the vote of the same cities in 1916, on State-wide prohibition of all liquors and the population of the several cities at the last census:

City.	November, 1916—was wet or dry.	November, 1916—voted wet or dry.	November, 1916—State wide.		April, 1919—beer and wine.		Population, 1910.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Are not most of these cities that you have just mentioned great industrial points, where they have thousands of workingmen?

Mr. CRAMTON. Nearly all. The results I have given you were achieved by the votes of laboring men. The Chicago Daily News commented upon it. They saw the significance of that election. That great metropolitan daily said editorially, following the election and without the detailed situation before it I have compiled for you, speaking of the general city results:

MICHIGAN'S VOTE ON PROHIBITION.

[Editorial from Chicago Daily News.]

Michigan's popular vote on the proposed amendment to its State constitution permitting the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers is particularly noteworthy. The returns indicate that not only the voters in the villages, small towns, and suburban districts but those in the larger towns and cities as well, with the exception of Detroit, gave heavy majorities against the amendment.

It would be unfortunate, of course, if on so important an issue as prohibition of the liquor traffic the country districts and the cities took opposite views and one section attempted to force its policy on the other section of the Commonwealth. Agreement between country and city would remove formidable difficulties from the path of those whose duty it is to enforce the law and prevent serious and widespread evasion of its requirements.

The vote in Michigan meets, so far as that State is concerned, the objection advanced in many quarters by opponents of constitutional prohibition, namely, that the people have not had an opportunity to pass on the issue, and that a referendum would result in a mandate for a compromise permitting the use of light beers and wines. The voters of Michigan were accorded precisely such an opportunity. They have sustained flat prohibition. In Michigan, at least, it can be contended no longer that a small, militant, extreme minority foisted an unpopular idea upon a disarmed electorate. And Michigan is by no means exceptional in its views on this subject, so far as the American public is aware.

I commend the result also to the study of all who are interested in the study of this great question. But I venture to commend the verdict of the cities of Michigan to all Members here who are concerned to know how their constituents are going to feel about the liquor traffic after the communities in which they live have, perhaps for the first time, the chance to taste the blessings of a saloonless city, a boozeless town, under the régime of national prohibition now opening.

In Detroit they found admissions to the Eloise Asylum had been 1,500 during the wet times, and during the first six months of dry 400. The county farm in Kent County has been almost closed up. They had not prisoners enough to work it. And so it has been all over the State. [Applause.] In the marine news of the Detroit News it recently was stated:

The absence of accidents aboard lake ships during the last 12 months is ascribed to the fact that a large number of Lake ports have been dry, operators of local steam passenger lines say. Vessel men on the Lakes generally say that fatal accidents due to intoxication have been materially reduced.

Detroit's entrance into the dry column resulted in fully 90 per cent of preventable accidents on local vessels being eliminated. Toledo is undergoing a similar experience, reports from that port indicate. With Cleveland bone-dry, freight-vessel operators believe this season will establish a new record. The sailor colony at Cleveland is said to be more dependable than ever before, since the men suffer from fewer accidents and are accountable at all times while ashore. This will be true at Buffalo and other wet Lake ports when the country goes dry June 30, mariners say.

It is probable that certain steamship lines operating boats between wet and dry ports, as well as the Lake Carriers' Association, will record figures of accidents this season to compare them with previous wet seasons. This will determine mathematically the results of prohibition, so far as the Lake sailor is concerned.

The prohibition wave has wiped out many famous water-front bars. For years these bars were the gathering places for sailors. Many captains found the water-front bar a good recruiting ground for sailors when touching port with short crews.

National prohibition will help us as well as you. The liquor dealers of Toledo tried to repeal the constitution of Michigan, and at times they made some dents in it. But enforcement in Michigan is in the hands of one of the ablest, most sincere, and courageous officials anywhere, Hon. Fred L. Woodworth, State food and drug commissioner, and Ohio wets were held down pretty well. National prohibition repeals them. And I read in the Detroit Free Press to-day that there being a vacancy in the office of sheriff of Monroe County, Mich., on the border between Detroit and Toledo, they are having trouble to find a man for the job to succeed former Sheriff Bairley. It is stated:

Members of the commission intrusted with selecting Bairley's successor—namely, the county clerk, probate judge, and prosecuting attorney—express doubt as to their ability to make an early selection. The office is on the fee basis, and while a veritable "mint" during the tenure of Bairley and his predecessor, has ceased to be a revenue producer, it is said, since Ohio went dry. The earnings have been so small in the last few weeks that Bairley has discussed the necessity of discharging his turnkey.

On this question Mr. Gompers can not speak for American labor or the American people. In the 1919 referendum Michigan repudiated his doctrines. A few weeks ago the Washington State Federation of Labor, in session at Bellingham, in terms repudiated his leadership on this great issue.

Many of you in eastern cities appear to be just catching alarm that national prohibition may interfere with the liquor traffic, may make it inconvenient to get a drink, may end the business of getting rich out of the injurious and degrading appetites of others. You may well take alarm, for that is what national prohibition is to do. It has the moral sense and the business judgment and common sense of the Nation behind it, and, under national prohibition, this Nation is to be "bone dry," and the prohibitory laws are to be enforced by the strong arm of national power of the American people, who are law-abiding and law respecting, not Bolshevistic. The Gompers talk has in it too much of pandering to foreign ideals, nourished on American soil, where they do not belong. A Michigan poet, Edgar Guest, gives the Michigan spirit, and it is not one of Bolshevism:

NO ROOM FOR HATE.

(By Edgar A. Guest.)

We have room for the man with an honest dream,
With his heart on fire and his eyes agleam;
We have room for the man with a purpose true,
Who comes to our shores to start life anew;
But we haven't an inch of space for him
Who comes to plot against life and limb.

We have room for the man who will learn our ways,
Who will stand by our flag in its troubled days;
We have room for the man who will till the soil,
Who will give his hands to a fair day's toil;
But we haven't an inch of space to spare
For the breeder of hatred and black despair.

We have room for the man who will neighbor here,
Who will keep his hands and his conscience clear;
We have room for the man who'll respect our laws
And pledge himself to our country's cause;
But we haven't an inch of land to give
To the alien breed that will alien live.

Against the vicious we bar the gate!
This is no breeding ground for hate.
This is the land of the brave and free,
And such, we pray, it shall always be.
We have room for men who will love our flag,
But none for the fiends of the scarlet rag.

The Nation is to be really dry and the Nation is to taste the benefits we of Michigan and other dry States have experienced. It is you eastern wets who are the theorists and we drys of prohibition States who are practical. You are imagining vain things out of your theories. We know the truth by experience and our experience will be yours.

The verdict which our cities gave was given because it was found that industry thrived, crime decreased, poverty was lessened, disease was checked, and prosperity, happiness, and contentment were the gainers. Great efforts have no doubt been made to spread the propaganda of anarchy in Michigan, as elsewhere, because the unusual prosperity of Michigan, due in large degree to prohibition, attracted outside radical agitators to Detroit. But there were no bombings, no anarchist plots, no strikes due to Bolshevists. And that headway has not been made is partly because of absence of saloons for gathering centers, with the inflammatory influence of liquor.

Out of the fruits of experience this greatest reform of this century has spread over our Nation and out of the blessings experienced under it your communities will thrive, countless homes be made happier, and present prejudices be forgotten.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. When the national prohibition amendment was before the House I voted against it, and I had hoped that there would be brought into this House a bill whereby the enforcing regulation would be reasonable, but in glancing roughly over this bill it seemed to me to be radical and rather conducive of much disturbance among the working people of this country.

A few moments ago the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] in his address made several queries concerning officials of Protestant Churches of the country, and as to why they had not come out in favor of the light beer and wine side of this question.

Let me read from an article in the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, which includes a statement from one of Philadelphia's most distinguished clergymen, Rev. Dr. Russell H. Conwell, who is the head of the Baptist Temple College of that city:

"GIVE POOR MAN BEER," PLEADS DR. CONWELL—CLERGYMAN SAYS IT IS UNFAIR TO ALLOW WEALTHY TO HOARD LIQUOR IN CELLARS.

Beer should be given to the poor man if the rich are to have their cellars stocked with a plentiful supply of wines and liquors, according to a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Russell H. Conwell last night at the Baptist Temple, Broad and Berks Streets. To restrict one class and not the other would be inconsistent, he continued.

"As a church we believe in temperance out and out," he said, "but we do not believe in allowing the rich man to fill his cellars for months and months ahead with all sorts of wines and liquors, while the poor man has his 2¾ per cent beer taken away from him. The whole thing is wrong; it is a great evil and will hurt the cause of temperance by withholding from the workingman such beer as is not intoxicating.

"Remember, I emphasize the fact, 'if it is not intoxicating,'" he went on. "I don't believe in intoxicating liquor sold to men under any circumstances unless used as a medicine. I have been told the wealthy have their cellars hoarded with intoxicants for years to come. Christ's Church does not believe in giving rights to one man that are denied to another."

When the war-time prohibition act received the approval of this House it certainly was never contemplated that the enactment into law and the enforcement thereof would continue after the demobilization of the Army. This bill is taking undue advantage of a war-time measure in a period of practical peace and places a condition of national prohibition in effect now, rather than to follow the orderly procedure of the constitutional amendment, which would place it in effect January 16, 1920.

Surely no Member of this House will say that it was ever intended at the time the war-time prohibition bill was passed that the American Congress would be asked to define beer and light wine containing more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol as intoxicating.

I am opposed to section 1 of this measure, because I believe it to be showing bad faith to the American people. It surely never was intended that this war-time prohibition should remain in effect after the laying down of arms.

The Evening Bulletin, of Philadelphia, which is one of the very conservative newspapers of our city, and which I am frank to say does not always agree with me, nor I with it, says in its editorial of June 30:

THE PROHIBITION MUDDLE.

The war has been virtually at an end for seven months, and it is now also technically and formally at an end. Most of the troops of the United States who were in Europe are to-day either at home or on their way back. To this country peace has been fully restored.

Yet we are now witnessing the illogical and anomalous demands that the war prohibition act shall be enforced on the 1st of July just the same as if the war were still going on. There is much that is grossly unfair or dishonest in the reasoning by which the law is thus interpreted.

It is tolerably clear in the latest statement by President Wilson as to his purposes that the enforcement, such as it may be, will not probably last much beyond the early part of August, if he shall then declare that the demobilization of the soldiers has been accomplished, as is likely to be the case by that time. But in point of substantial justice Congress ought to repeal the law in toto and at once.

In the meantime, however, or in the absence of such repeal, the law should be obeyed, although the extreme prohibitionists have not been wise in construing it so severely and unjustly as to make it a possible means of forcing prohibition into effect more than six months in advance of the constitutional amendment.

President Wilson will certainly act in the interest of a square deal by pushing demobilization to early completion, so that a law which was clearly designed for the war only shall not be twisted in a time of peace to a purpose for which it was not intended.

I am particularly opposed to the feature of the bill which fixes the percentage of alcohol in beer at less than 2¾ per cent, because that question, I believe, can be trusted to the courts to determine. One of the most eminent experts at the Pennsylvania University has said, "After a most careful study and examination I find that beer of less than 2¾ per cent is not intoxicating," and in my conversation with no less than 12 well-known physicians of Philadelphia, who have made a study of the question, all say that beer and wine of less than 2¾ per cent are nonintoxicating.

I am further opposed to the bill in its present form because it virtually makes for discrimination between the wealthy, who have stored large stocks of liquors for their future use, and the workingman, who earns his living by the "sweat of his brow," who is deprived of his mild beer, which is harmless.

Surely this Congress does not want the American workman to feel that the lawmakers of the country are antagonistic to the wishes of the great masses of the working people of the Nation. Surely a law which permits the wealthy to imbibe liquors of all kinds and at the same time prohibits the workingman to have his glass of beer is not in line with the spirit of our Government, which insures equal liberty and freedom to all. Why interfere with the liberty of the workingman?

It seems to me that legislation of this kind will do much toward encouraging the unrest which now prevails throughout the country, and I am very hopeful that the distinguished chairman of this committee, who has brought this bill into the House, will in his wise judgment as he looks over the different statements that have been made propose such modifications in the bill as will meet the demands of the working people of the country. [Applause.]

During the recent months we have heard much talk in the House relative to legislating for the interests of the farmer. I am wondering how the advocates of the farmer are going to vote on this question. Are you going to vote to partially destroy the grape industry of the country? Why reduce the farmers' income?

I have in mind a part of my district where there are probably 5,000 families of Italian extraction who have been accustomed to making their own grape wine. Under this law if they have their wine in their cellar now they can keep it for their own purpose. If, however, they want to make more, and go to the market and buy several bushels of grapes and put them into a barrel in the cellar alongside of the existing cask of wine already made, and put nothing into that barrel but the grapes, in a few months they would be criminals. This grape juice would have fermented, and they will have it in their possession, and they will have been manufacturers of intoxicating liquors. These residents are law-abiding and God-fearing people, 5,000 families, who have been accustomed to having wine served to all their children, as well as to the grown-ups, home-made grape wine, with no other ingredients placed therein. Many of the men of these families have just returned from the battle fields of France, where they were not deprived of their wine. They are hard-working people at home, and should not be deprived of what has been their custom here.

It would seem to me that the friends of prohibition who are desirous of seeing that the law is properly put into effect and enforced, to meet the approval of the country, are injuring their cause by irritating the great army of plain people of the Nation, who feel they are entitled to the right to use mild beer and light wines. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE CHEMICAL FOUNDATION (INC.).

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter that I have written to Joseph H. Choate, Esq., in answer to one that was written by him to me and which was inserted in the RECORD at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter which he has written in response to one addressed to him and printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

JULY 11, 1919.

JOSEPH H. CHOATE, Jr., Esq.,
General Counsel the Chemical Foundation (Inc.),
Care of the Alien Property Custodian, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHOATE: Referring to your letter of June 27, which Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I advise you that my remarks which you criticized were directed chiefly to the anomaly of appointing Mr. Francis P. Garvan, the Alien Property Custodian, an Assistant Attorney General to detect anarchists and bomb throwers after he had been elected president of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), which seeks, through you as general counsel, the passage of the dyestuffs bill.

But since I did refer to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) and the methods by which, through the instrumentality of the Alien Property Custodian's office, it secured from the Government at private sale the valuable German patents taken over by the Alien Property Custodian under the trading-with-the-enemy act, I do not object to the publicity given your letter by Mr. BYRNES or by the newspapers which published it before it was received by me. I am inclined to think the more publicity we have as to this unusual transaction the better it will be for all concerned.

One of the evils from which the country suffers when a great war is on, or during the reconstruction period when almost everything bearing a patriotic label is given credence, is lack of information concerning the motives of some who wrongfully use the label for selfish interests. The newspapers do not always have the inclination or the space to go fully into matters which vitally affect our business affairs, and Members of Congress find themselves burdened with so much pressing legislation that what ordinarily would invite sensational inquiry frequently passes along with the dull routine unobserved.

In this session of Congress, when efforts are being made to take an account of the national stock and to probe the doings of those who were in control when the rush was on; when it is fair that the people should know what has been done in their name by law or by Executive order, by department chief or by bureaucrat, by commanding general or by petty officer, at home or abroad; and when it is equally important that they should know what is proposed to be done for them or in defiance of their rights, it may be well to further discuss the plans and purposes of such a far-reaching scheme as is contemplated by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), organized and supported, as it seems to have been, by those who were associated with the Alien Property Custodian in the huge task of seizing and operating enemy business and property to an amount estimated at $500,000,000.

I have therefore asked, in fairness to you and to all parties concerned, that the Attorney General, who was Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Garvan, who is now Alien Property Custodian and also president of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), together with the officers and trustees of that concern, be invited to attend meetings of the Ways and Means Committee on Monday and Tuesday next (July 14 and 15, 1919), in order that further inquiry may be had and justice done as the circumstances warrant. The chairman of the committee, Mr. FORDNEY, has authorized invitations to be forwarded as indicated, and I will be pleased if you will do what you can to induce the gentlemen mentioned to be present.

As the dye bill, which you and your associates supported, has been reintroduced since the hearings closed, with a provision for the establishment of a licensing system to control the distribution of dyestuffs in the United States, the Alien Property Custodian's office and the officers of your foundation, including Mr. Otto T. Bannard, Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, Mr. George L. Ingraham, Mr. B. Howell Griswold, jr., and Mr. Ralph Stone, might be able to aid the committee in determining whether the installation of this extraordinary method of controlling supplies and prices should be made a part of our protective tariff system.

Very truly, yours,

J. H. MOORE.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow I may be allowed to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On what subject?

Mr. DALLINGER. Relative to a letter received from a returned soldier regarding conditions in France.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on what subject?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not on the subject of prohibition. It is on the subject of a resolution introduced by me in the House to-day, calling on the War Department for certain information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRINTING THE TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of Members of the House, to be distributed through the folding room, Senate Document No. 49, the Treaty of Peace with Germany, a number not to exceed the cost of $500.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to that, to print 25,000 copies of the President's speech delivered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri offers to amend by inserting, at the end of the resolution, the words: "And that 25,000 copies of the President's speech delivered in the Senate yesterday be also printed."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As a separate document?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As a separate document, to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the concurrent resolution that was introduced in the Senate, providing for the printing of 50,000 copies—40,000 for the Senate and 10,000 for the House—as I understand it, included also the President's speech.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FESS. They also passed a resolution yesterday providing for the printing of $500 worth of copies of the treaty.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, July 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

TREATMENT OF OUR SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter received by me from a soldier.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter which I have received from Mr. James W. Beckman, of New York City, a former sergeant major with our troops in France. It contains some of the charges against the officials of the provost marshal's office of the American Expeditionary Forces at Paris that are appearing daily in the New York Globe and other papers of the country. I have met Mr. Beckman, have read copies of affidavits substantiating these charges, have talked with men who served in the Army in France, who state that the conditions described were matters of common knowledge to the American soldier in France, and have become convinced that there is truth in these reports.

Briefly, it is charged that our soldiers who went to France imbued with patriotism—the best blood of our land—sailed across the sea to fight despotism and found a species of despotism worse than that for which we are going to punish the Kaiser. Assertions are made that our own loved ones were beaten, clubbed, starved, all in the name of democracy; that men caught in the web of the American military police system of Paris were placed in prison pens viler than those of Andersonville; that our soldiers, some of them wearing wound stripes, some returning to duty after weeks and months of suffering in hospitals, were thrown into prison without trial and without charges ever being preferred against them for such offenses as failure to have proper military travel orders in their possession. Evidence is produced showing that men were hit and clubbed until they bled and fainted, and that one man even preferred death to the treatment to which he was subjected and took his own life.

One can only gasp at such tales of barbarism. It takes one back to the horrors of the middle ages and the tragedies of the French Revolution for a fitting parallel. Our own men captured in the heat of battle by the Hun, captured at a time when blood ran free, were treated with loving kindness in comparison.

Let me at least quote to the House, Mr. Speaker, three short paragraphs of this letter sent me by Sergt. Beckman. He writes:

A most horrible incident was the case of a soldier who could not speak English very well, much less understand it thoroughly. He was struck and beaten for not snapping to a minor command. He cried, "This is terrible."

"We'll show you how terrible it is," replied those who were beating him, and he was taken before the personnel officer and two sergeants. A lieutenant beat him again, and put him in a cell on bread and water. Evidently they considered this too good for him, so he was placed in a pup tent for solitary confinement.

During the afternoon his quietness was noticed, and when they went over and tore his tent down he was lying on his back with his throat cut. It was about an hour before the ambulance arrived and the silent form borne off to the hospital. And thousands of miles across the sea and land perhaps there awaited a gray-haired mother with a service star in the window of her humble home, who received word from the War Department that Gen. Pershing had reported her son among those who "died from other causes."

As the chosen representatives of 100,000,000 free people we can not sit idly while stories of torture such as these are made. They must be proven false or true, and if true every officer and every enlisted man who was in any way responsible for such conditions, either directly or indirectly to blame, must suffer a proper punishment. Democrat and Republican must stand together to institute such reforms in our Army and our War Department that in the future, if it be necessary, we can send our sons and loved ones away again to fight for their country with the assurance that each soldier will be treated as a free man until he is found guilty by a proper court of an infraction of military law.

I have turned over the information in my possession to the select committee of the House appointed to investigate the expenditures in the War Department. I shall watch the investigation of these charges by that committee, and I know that every other Member of this House will do the same. There will be a unanimous demand that the facts be ferreted out. I am confident that this committee will call witnesses and ask for the records of the War Department and conduct an impartial and thorough investigation of the truth of these charges.

NEW YORK CITY, June 20, 1919.

HON. FREDERICK W. DALLINGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a former soldier, who volunteered to fight the fight for democracy and who served in France about one year with the American Expeditionary Forces and who was recently returned to America and honorably discharged with the rank of sergeant major, I wish to lay before you, a Member of Congress, facts relative to the treatment received by loyal American soldiers by the American authorities at Paris. Every charge I make, you will see, is substantiated by copies of affidavits which I attach. Every charge can be proved. I believe you will agree with me that they are of such a horrible nature that they warrant the attention of every loyal American, and especially every Member of Congress. Thus their repetition will become impossible. It should be borne in mind that there is good reason to believe that the same things are going on in France to-day. If there is even a remote possibility of that being the case, I am sure every father and every mother who has a son over there will demand the proper action by Congress, and I believe that the 2,000,000 soldiers who served in France and their parents, families, and friends will want to know of every Member of Congress why he failed—if you and your colleagues do fail—why he failed to do his part to correct conditions when they were brought to his attention.

When a man was picked up in Paris without a pass or with a pass that had expired by members of the American military police, he was taken to the provost marshal, in Ste. Anne's Hotel, Paris. At this place he was given no opportunity to explain his case, but was accused of being absent without leave, a thing that was true in only a comparatively few cases. Most of these men were casuals returning from hospitals or traveling under military orders, but, through lack of knowledge of the Prussian military regulations of the American Army governing Paris, fell victims of the unspeakable American military police system of Paris.

An example of the contemptible manner in which the military police conducted their operations in Paris is the advertisements they ran in the American editions of Paris newspapers that American soldiers in Paris would be welcomed at the Ste. Anne's Hotel. This was the headquarters of the American military police, and soldiers who responded to these advertisements in good faith were arrested if there was the slightest irregularity about their papers. This was a frequent occurrence, because most American officers were so ignorant of Army paper work that they seldom knew how to get any but the simplest military orders right. Once in the clutches of the military police at Ste. Anne's Hotel, the Bastille was only a day away.

Another way men were trapped and betrayed by the military police was when a man would arrive in Paris, say, at the Gare du Nord, a railway station of Paris, perhaps having come from a hospital and not knowing just where to go, would go up to the provost marshal at the station, and explain his situation, and ask for instructions. The military police at the station would be very sympathetic and say to the soldier, "Oh, yes; that can be very easily fixed up if you will just go and see the provost marshal at Ste. Anne's Hotel. They will straighten everything up for you and tell you what to do." So the man would go to the headquarters of the military police as directed by those in authority. But he would be sent without a pass. Naturally, he could not be expected to know the local regulations. That was why he inquired for instructions. There, without being given any opportunity to explain his case at all, he was placed under arrest almost before he knew it and accused of being absent without leave. I am saying accused, because they were put through all their ensuing torture without having any charges preferred against them, nor being allowed to explain their cases and proceed to their organizations.

Prisoners were usually detained at the Ste. Anne's Hotel about one day, when they were transported in trucks to the Bastille. However, on one occasion nine men were forced to stand on the roof of this hotel two days and two nights. If they faltered or fell from exhaustion, they were beaten up by the military police under officers' orders.

The prison used by the American Expeditionary Forces at Paris is a big stone building, inclosed by a strong wall about 15 feet high. It contains many tiers of stone cells, each cell with a padlocked iron door. The cells are small holes in walls strung along dark halls. Each cell has only a single cot.

Two men and often three were forced into a single cell. Four men have been confined in a single one of these cells. In one instance the fourth was compelled to sleep on the floor without a blanket. The men were herded to their cells by a general prisoner by the name of Cohen, who shouted, "Get in your holes, you rats, or you're out of luck."

The guards were a hard lot. One night three of them were playing a game of cards. They got into an argument and one of the guards accused another of something and said he had a good mind to shoot him. The fellow dared him to shoot, and the guard then pulled out his gun and killed the other two. This shows the type of men that were chosen to confine men who were some of America's noblest fighting heroes. The military police were apparently under the influence of liquor most of the time.

When the soldiers entered this prison they were listed as prisoners and subjected to prison regulations. They were compelled to surrender their leggings and all personal belongings, including their money. All during the procedure the soldiers were sworn at and reviled with unprintable language.

One night when a bunch of soldiers were brought there and were waiting in the guard room to be assigned to cells, a soldier did some trivial thing. A noncommissioned officer ordered a sergeant to hit the man. The sergeant in the most casual manner reached over and hit him on the head with a club. It was a common thing at night to hear men groaning. When anyone inquired what was the matter, he was told that the men were being beaten by prison guards.

One man charged with a theft of something like 80,000 francs, about $15,000, escaped from the prison. The first night of the day of his capture he was beaten into unconsciousness and then revived with cold water and beaten again. This treatment was kept up for three days. The man went about the Bastile with his face all bandaged up and looked like a human wreck.

One night about 10 o'clock a negro was beaten all the way down the hall to his cell and one of the men beating him was heard to say, "You will try to kill a white man, you black ——." "The cries of the negro were frightful," says a report.

Men were ordinarily kept here only one day. However, on one occasion about five or six men taken to the prison in a "detachment" of prisoners were held there for 16 days because their papers had been lost by the military police. During the entire 16 days of their confinement in the prison these men tried every way they could to have an interview with an officer, but were refused. At last, in a general check-up of the number of prisoners it was found that there were five or six more than were accounted for. There were in the neighborhood of a thousand soldiers in the place. It was thus that these men were discovered and sent out to farm No. 2.

In the case of one man who had been in France only a week before his arrest, I understand that while changing trains at Paris, during a necessary wait of a few hours, he became slightly affected with drink, was noticed by an American military policeman, picked up, and sent to Ste. Anne's Hotel. He was held in the prison for 16 days, then sent to farm No. 2 for 16 days, and finally spent 6 days at the stockade. This made a total of 38 days. He had arrived in France November 12, 1918, the day after the armistice was signed, and on the 20th he was a prisoner. Sent to France to fight for the world's liberty and democracy, in the two months he had been there he had been free only 8 days! The rest of the time he was a prisoner with no charge against him being brought up.

Farm No. 2 was then run by Company K, One hundred and fifty-eighth Infantry, of the Fortieth Division. Lieut. Smith was the officer in charge. This lieutenant was known as "Hard Boiled Smith"; in fact, he boasted of it before the men when giving special exhibitions of his criminal brutality. Farm No. 2 was a French farm outside of Paris used by the American Army as a prison camp. There were many stables, three-quarters of which were used by the men of Company K, which numbered about 250 men. The other quarter of the stables was used for the prisoners, who sometimes numbered as high as 1,200 men. These men were quartered in something like 10 stalls, each about the size of a two-horse stall, and a loft just above these stalls. The overflow was put in pup tents in a small yard. About 16 men slept in a single stall. For the 1,200 men there was but one latrine about 12 feet long and 2 feet wide. It was situated close to where the men slept. The insanitary conditions were frightful.

When soldiers arrived at this farm from the Paris prison they were taken, two at a time, to an upper floor of the building used by the company commander as his headquarters. Here they were thoroughly searched by two sergeants in the presence of an officer. If the personal belongings or money of the men had been returned to them before they left the Paris prison, they were taken away from them here. A big box was placed in the center of the room. As the men's belongings were taken from them they were tossed into this box. Lieut. Hepstein sat beside the box and immediately took possession of anything that was valuable. Money was thrown into this box, and there was no way of identifying to whom it belonged. In some cases the men were given receipts for their money; but in others they were not. It all seemed to depend upon the whim of the officer.

Many of the men had been in the lines, where they had fought the Hun to defeat and death. They had acquired a good many souvenirs from Germans killed in battle or taken prisoners. These souvenirs included almost everything—belts, helmets, Luger automatic pistols, watches, iron crosses, medals, and any number of articles. Naturally, the men prized these treasures highly. They had won them in the fight to make the world safe for democracy.

These souvenirs were grabbed by the sergeants and officers with great exultation. The outfit running farm No. 2 during the period herein described had been in France only since the latter part of July or the early part of August, 1918, and none of the men in it ever saw any action. These officers and sergeants were only too glad to rob the men who fought for them of their hard-earned trophies.

It was a common thing to see a sergeant knock a man down or beat him up on the slightest provocation. One morning as the men fell in line for breakfast one man was slightly out of line. Sergt. Ball went up to him and punched him in the face six times.

A most horrible incident was the case of a soldier who could not speak English very well, much less understand it thoroughly. He was struck and beaten for not snapping to a minor command. He cried "This is terrible."

"We'll show you how terrible it is," replied those who were beating him, and he was taken before the personnel officer and two sergeants. A lieutenant beat him again and put him in a cell on bread and water. Evidently they considered this too good for him, so he was placed in a pup tent for solitary confinement.

During the afternoon his quietness was noticed, and when they went over and tore his tent down he was lying on his back with his throat cut. It was about an hour before the ambulance arrived and the silent form borne off to the hospital. And thousands of miles across the sea and land perhaps there awaited a gray-haired mother with a service star in the window of her humble home who received word from the War Department that Gen. Pershing had reported her son among those who "died from other causes."

The prison number of this unfortunate young man persecuted into committing suicide was 634. The date was about December 5 or 6, 1918, and the hour his body was borne away was about 3 in the afternoon.

One morning about 9 o'clock four men were taken into one of the stalls in the stable and beaten with blackjacks for 20 minutes. When they came out the blood was streaming from their faces and they were in a horrible condition. Lieut. Hepstein, Sergt. Ball, and a duty sergeant of Company K, One hundred and fifty-eighth Infantry, together with three general prisoners, entered the stall with these four men who were beaten up. A guard with a rifle on his shoulder stood at the door. After the men came out, Lieut. Hepstein and another stood in the door examining their fists. The men were taken over to wash off the blood, and one man, a little weaker than the other three, lingered behind. Sergt. Ball punched him in the ear from behind and kicked him into line with the other three. These men were put on bread and water. A prisoner who carried the water to them said the guard inquired at the kitchen for their bread, but the mess sergeant told him there was no bread, so the men had to go without it.

About 2 o'clock of that afternoon three French women were escorted to the officers' quarters by Lieut. Hepstein, Lieut. Mason, and Lieut. Leslie. That night the piano played until 2 o'clock in the morning.

Some of the men were kept as long as three weeks at this farm and then they were sent to the stockade just outside of Cholles. This stockade was a regular military prison with a big iron fence all around it and lookout posts about 20 feet high. The stockade was even worse than farm No. 2. The men received the same criminal treatment and the living conditions were worse, if possible, than those at farm No. 2, because the stockade was simply an inclosure of mud with no shelter of any kind aside from miserable little tents.

Two of the prisoners at farm No. 2, after the armistice was signed, said they had been prisoners of war in Germany and that the treatment they received in the German prison camps had been far better than that which they received in the Paris prison, at farm No. 2, and in the stockade.

The incidents I have related in this letter I can substantiate, and are contained in an official report from the inspector general of the Second Army Corps to General Headquarters American Expeditionary Forces, and represent only a few of the atrocities committed at these places.

Newly returned soldiers, whom I know personally and on whom I rely, inform me that conditions such as I have described still exist, and that there seems to have been no improvement.

Lieut. Col. Ansell has told us what happens to the soldier for the slightest infraction of Army Regulations. I wonder what sort of punishment has been or will be meted out to those responsible for cruelties and tortures worse than ever experienced at Andersonville.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES W. BECKMAN.

LUXURY TAXES.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 2021, on the Union Calendar, No. 3, be referred back to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that House bill 2021 on the Union Calendar be referred back to the Committee on Ways and Means. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is a bill introduced and brought up in the House some time ago to repeal section 904 of the revenue act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, what is the purpose?

Mr. FORDNEY. Other bills have been introduced to repeal other sections of the law. A request was made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the matter be postponed as to further repeal of that section of the law until he could make a report to the committee. The committee has received the report from the commissioner, and would like to have the bill referred back.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print with this request a letter received from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue setting forth the estimated revenue that will be collected under that law for the last year and the coming year's taxes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 1, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FORDNEY: Referring to your telephone request for my opinion with regard to the possible yield of revenue for the first 12-month period under the revenue act of 1918, I regret that our experience thus far, covering only a period of four months under the law, will not enable me to speak as definitely as you would desire and I should like.

Between July 1, 1918, and February 24, 1919, when the present law went into effect, there was collected from all sources under the act of 1917 and deposited in the general depositaries, as reported to this bureau, $1,081,000,000.

Between the effective date of the present law, February 24, 1919, and the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1919, there has been collected $2,758,000,000, making a total for the fiscal year 1919 of $3,839,000,000.

We have, as you know, had the benefit of only two of the four installment payments under the present law. On the March 15 installment we collected from income and profits taxes $1,185,000,000; from the second installment, due June 15, we collected from income and profits taxes $949,000,000. The collections, therefore, from income and profits taxes for the two installments amount to slightly more than $2,134,000,000.

It is my opinion that the number of individuals and corporations that have paid their income and profits taxes in full will reduce the September and December installments from these sources to possibly $900,000,000 each, making the collections from income and profits taxes under the law, for the first 12-month period, $3,900,000,000. The estimated yield under this law from income and profits taxes was $4,400,000,000. We are expediting the audit of old income and profits returns in such a way that we may be able to make up from back taxes, the canvass of delinquent taxpayers, and other internal-revenue sources the apparent deficit in the estimates above indicated.

We have been delayed in interpreting the law and getting out the necessary regulations and forms for the collection of the sales and miscellaneous taxes, but this is now under full headway, and we expect to collect slightly more than the amount estimated.

I am of the opinion that we shall be able to collect during the first 12-month period under the new law the estimated amount, $5,800,000,000, and the estimated $4,000,000,000 during the second 12-month period under the reduced rates. At this time there is not sufficient indication of additional margin over the estimated amounts to justify a recommendation for the repeal of any revenue-producing section of the law other than as already indicated by the department without there should be substituted therefor equally productive revenue sources.

Sincerely, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER, Commissioner.

ABSENCE OF A QUORUM.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present in order that Members may have an opportunity to hear the President's message.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

PRINTING THE TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 30,000 copies of the President's address to the Senate on Thursday last be printed as a House document, to be distributed through the folding room. I endeavored yesterday to secure this as an amendment to the resolution which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] offered, but on very bad information he said that it was already printed along with the treaty in the Senate. I then withdrew the amendment which I offered and this morning the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] tells me that what he stated yesterday was not true. People want the speech. Of course all of the newspapers have published it, but some people keep files of these addresses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that 30,000 copies of the President's address to the Senate on Thursday last be printed as a House document for the use of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I take the liberty of returning H. R. 3157, "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," without my signature.

I realize, of course, the grave inconvenience which may arise from the postponement of this legislation at this time, but feel obliged to withhold my signature because of the clause which provides that "at and after 2 o'clock antemeridian on Sunday, October 26, 1919, next, the act entitled 'An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States,' approved March 19, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

I believe that the repeal of the act referred to would be a very grave inconvenience to the country, and I think that I am justified in saying that it would constitute something more than an inconvenience. It would involve a serious economic loss. The act of March 19, 1918, to "save daylight" resulted not only from a careful study of industrial conditions by competent men familiar with the business operations of the country, but also from observation of the happy and beneficial consequences of similar legislation in other countries where legislation of this character has been for some time in operation, and where it has resulted, as the act of March 19, 1918, has resulted in the United States, in substantial economies. That act was intended to place the chief business activities of the country as nearly as might be within the limits of daylight throughout the year. It resulted in very great economies of fuel and in substantial economies of energy, because of the very different effect of work done in the daylight and work done by artificial light. It, moreover, served the daily convenience of the many communities of the country in a way which gave all but universal satisfaction, and the overwhelming testimony of its value which has come to me convinces me that I should not be justified in acquiescing in its repeal.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
11 July, 1919.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Agricultural appropriation bill, with the President's veto, be taken up for consideration on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the Agricultural appropriation bill, together with the President's veto, be taken up for consideration on Monday next immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman if he intends to take up the Agricultural bill section by section and go through all of it in the event that the President's veto is sustained?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my request is to take the bill up for reconsideration, in view of the President's message, under the rules on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why not take it up now?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that the Members want to have a little time in which to consider the veto. There has been no advance information with regard to it. I think it is hardly fair to the House or to the President, and particularly to those Members of the House who are not present to-day, to take the matter up immediately.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not see why this matter is not taken up now, when this large membership is present.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming, when will the vote be taken on the President's veto?

The SPEAKER. Unless some motion intervenes, it will be taken immediately. It would be in order to move to postpone it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to postpone the reconsideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, together with the President's veto, until Monday next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that the reconsideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, with the President's veto, be postponed until Monday next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. MCARTHUR) there were—ayes 225, noes 77.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-four Members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. A vote has just shown 302 Members present, and the Chair does not think he is called upon to ask for the other side.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL—VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I find myself obliged to return H. R. 6176, "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," without my signature, because of certain items of the bill which seem to me likely to be of the most serious consequences. Under the vocational rehabilitation bill, which became law June 27, 1918, the Congress has sought to fulfill the expectations of the country that their soldier, sailor, and marine disabled in the recent war should be given an opportunity to secure at the expense and under the fostering care of the Federal Government such training as he needs to overcome the handicap of his disability and to resume his place as a civilian able to earn a living upon something like equal footing with those with whom he was associated before he made his great sacrifice for the honor and defense of the country.

The work of rehabilitation under this admirable law is now at its height, and was to have been given greater speed and certainty by the amendment to section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation bill, which I have to-day signed, and which places the whole responsibility for vocational training in a single agency, virtually transferring from the War Risk Insurance Bureau to the Federal Board for Vocational Education $6,000,000 with which to support disabled men in training at the generous figure of $80 a month for a single man and $100 a month for a man and his wife.

It is a matter of very grave concern, therefore, that at the very moment when these disabled men are coming in constantly increasing numbers to the Government to avail themselves of this generous plan that there should appear in the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I now return, limiting clauses which will do much more than seriously cripple and retard the beneficial work of restoring these men to useful and contented lives. Those clauses would probably, in fact, if put into effect, nullify the whole purpose of the act and render its administration practically impossible. The section of the bill which I now return, which governs the appropriation for this work, provides the sum of $6,000,000 for all the expenses of rehabilitation, including the support of the disabled men in training, and this sum is stated to be "in lieu of the appropriation contained in the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1918." Inasmuch as there are already over 4,000 disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines in training, and inasmuch as another 4,000 will be put into training now that the amendment to section 2 has become law, it is clear that even at the rate of only $80 a month a sum approximating $8,000,000 will be required for the mere support of these men, and that under the present appropriation nothing will be available for their tuition and travel or for placing them where they can earn a living, and it will be impossible to meet the needs of the new thousands who are every week seeking the benefits of the rehabilitation act. In the offices of the board in the District of Columbia and in 14 great centers of the United States immediate help is being given to men in need of these services, and these offices are used for the essential purpose of keeping accurate records, of providing proper medical survey of the men, of caring for them in their illnesses, and for various administrative costs inseparable from difficult work of this kind, which must, in the present circumstances, reach to every corner of the United States.

Furthermore, the same section of the sundry civil bill places such limitations upon the salaries which the Federal Board for Vocational Education is permitted to pay that it will inevitably result in the loss by the Vocational Board of a very large number of men who have made themselves especially valuable, and, indeed, indispensable, in this new work by reason of their native ability, their proven general experience, and their special training, and to whose advice the disabled men must look as well as for superintendence in the matter of training and employment. Among these are the vocational advisers, whose special duty it is to study the men in the hospitals, confer with them, and lay out their vocational plans. These hospital cases must, if these men are to be dismissed or allowed to resign, get along entirely without such advice and supervision until they have been able, after their discharge, to make their way on their own initiative to the distant offices of the Federal board.

These serious limitations upon the amount of money available and the uses to which it is to be put involves, therefore, an actual disruption of a carefully built up service at the very moment when the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines now in the country or returning to it are most immediately in need of help. This is a matter of the gravest consequence. It can not but have far-reaching and disastrous effects upon the plan so carefully thought out for the immediate and thorough rehabilitation of men in the service of the country.

I therefore return the bill with the hope that the Congress will reconsider this section of the law, restore the six millions appropriated under the act amending section 2, and most liberally revise the salary limitations, so that this beneficent work may go on and go on at once. I am convinced that in this matter I speak the sentiments and the hopes of those who have most carefully studied the needs of the returning soldiers and who are best qualified to carry out a purpose which I am sure the country has very much at heart.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
11 July, 1919.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 6176, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the President's message in regard thereto, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the President's message be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. And on that motion I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If the motion of the gentleman from Iowa should not prevail—that is, if it should not be referred to the Committee on Appropriations—when would the vote on the question of sustaining or overriding the veto come?

The SPEAKER. It will be voted on immediately, unless some other motion shall direct or fix some other time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I was taken by surprise by the motion of the gentleman from Iowa. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I am not objecting to its going to the committee, but as a matter of justice and fair dealing I think I should be permitted to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one or two questions.

Mr. GOOD. The previous question has been ordered; there is only one question before the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask if under the rules of the House debate is not allowed upon a motion of this sort?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes on a side is allowed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa first. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care at this time to be heard upon the motion at all. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. Unless some member of the Committee on Appropriations on the minority side desires recognition the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was not the motion for the previous question carried?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then what is the parliamentary status?

The SPEAKER. There are 20 minutes on a side on the previous question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a very brief statement in connection with the veto message of the President as relating to this appropriation. The Members of the House who are present will remember that when we had up the discussion of the sundry civil bill carrying this item that in connection with the other members of the Committee on Education I very sincerely and earnestly sought to impress upon the membership of the Committee of the Whole House at that time the utter inadequacy of the appropriation carried in the bill for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Vocational Board. And when the matter came back to the House and was reported by the conferees Members will recall I asked the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the motion to postpone or refer. I make the point of order he must confine himself to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The question before the House is to refer to the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman, of course, must confine himself to that motion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I was merely stating the preliminary situation before referring to that proposition. As far as I am personally concerned, without any conference with the other members of the Committee on Education, I have no objection to this motion which has been offered by the gentleman from Iowa, but I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in view of this proposed reference to his committee, in view of the statements made by the President, and in view of the statements contained in the summary of the situation which I had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Wednesday, whether or not the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will be inclined to reconsider the proposition upon its merits at an immediate date and refer the matter back to the House, and if so, when?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman it has always been the policy of the Committee on Appropriations in a matter of the importance of this provision to give it full consideration within the time that the committee can consider it. The committee did consider this matter. The limitation placed upon the bill with reference to salaries is much more liberal than the bill which the gentleman voted for in the last Congress and which passed the House with much more stringent limitations as to salaries. The very thing that the President complains of passed the House without a dissenting vote, and even the presidential voice was not heard with regard to that action, which took place more than four months ago, until 12 days after this bill should have become the law. My object in sending the bill to the Committee on Appropriations is that this matter might be investigated and find out what the merits of the presidential message were in that respect, and if the situation is serious to correct it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question that the gentleman from Iowa is pursuing the very path of the gentleman from Alabama, that he is discussing the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Iowa was discussing the question of whether it should go to the committee or not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As far as I am concerned, I do not care to raise that phase of it. I think the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa clearly indicate, as far as that is concerned, he has the same fixed opinion upon this proposition that he had entertained heretofore, and I want to ask the gentleman if he in these hearings will call before the committee the Director of the Vocational Board and those who have charge of its administration in an executive way——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my point of order. The only thing before the House is the question of whether this matter shall be postponed or be referred to the committee. A discussion on the merits of the bill is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The point of the gentleman from Illinois is well taken, that the only subject before the House is the reference to the committee, but the House in determining whether it shall be referred or not can properly consider in some measure the objections that are made to it. The Chair thinks the colloquy between the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Iowa was in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered. The question is on referring the bill with the veto to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

The SPEAKER. The House under its previous order automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the prohibition-enforcement law. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, of which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The CHAIRMAN. There remain 3 hours and 13 minutes for general debate, 1 hour and 35 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 1 hour and 38 minutes by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES].

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this Sixty-sixth Congress, in the discussion of this bill, which is designed to give effect to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it has been stated by a Member of this House that this bill was not drafted by the Judiciary Committee. As a member of the committee, I can not state who was the author of the original draft; but I am able to say that the bill as presented to this House by the chairman of the committee is not, by any means, the original draft but is the faithful presentation of the views of a very large majority of the committee, after hearings and discussions extending over a period of nearly 30 days. And I give credit to every member of the committee for his earnestness in urging his attitude in connection with the many propositions that were proposed, discussed, and considered.

While a majority of the committee is responsible for the presentation of this bill, the real responsibility now rests upon the Members of this House. The work of adding an amendment, of any kind or character, to the Constitution of this Government involves a most serious undertaking. One that should not be attempted unless a great national question is involved affecting vitally the lives, happiness, and welfare of the people of this Nation—in the language of the preamble of our Constitution: "Promote the general welfare."

So important did the framers of our Constitution regard the matter of amendments thereto that they provided the method, and declared that before an amendment could be lawfully proposed two-thirds of both Houses of Congress shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments. This done, the proposed amendment does not become a part of the Constitution until the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States ratify the proposal.

All this precaution has attended the adoption of Article XVIII, with which we are dealing, and which has now become and is a part of the supreme law of the land. Every Member of this Congress has taken a solemn oath to support and defend this article as fully and to the same extent as the other 17.

This is a Republic in fact when ruled by a majority of the people, and it occurs to me that a Congressman, of all other citizens, can illy afford to suggest that any law this Congress enacts to give force and effect to Article XVIII will not be obeyed.

I am also convinced that the gentleman who said in his discussion of this bill that the next or any subsequent Congress could make provision for an intoxicant containing 12 per cent of alcohol did not fully realize what he was saying. As, if the gentleman's statement is correct, a subsequent Congress might repeal the one-half of 1 per cent clause and in lieu thereof insert 70 or even 100 per cent.

In such event, I ask the gentleman what he thinks the Supreme Court of the United States would say about such an amendment.

This amendment to the Constitution authorizes this Congress to pass laws for its enforcement. The amendment means just what the words import—to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. Three States of this Union only have neglected to ratify this amendment. There is but one side to the question as to where our duty lies. The people of this country, without regard to politics, expect Congress to enact laws that will enforce the provisions of this constitutional amendment and to effectually enforce them.

Much quibbling is being indulged in on the question, What is intoxicating liquor? There are certainly degrees of intoxication, and it is well known that the degree of intoxication depends upon the per cent of alcohol contained in the liquor and the quantity taken into the stomach within a given time.

The Supreme Court of Iowa has held many times, under the statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor, that the sale of any beverage containing any alcohol whatsoever is prohibited. Iowa is not alone in such construction of like statutes. It is supported by the decisions of the courts of other States and of the Federal courts.

The broad statements of some physicians, testifying in favor of the brewers, that 2¾ per cent alcohol in beer is not intoxicating is misleading. They should be subjected to a cross-examination and their full testimony considered before it can be fairly urged that what they say upon direct examination constitutes all the testimony in the case. The average man, who has touched elbows with his fellow men for a considerable portion of his life, undoubtedly knows that one ordinary glass of 2¾ per cent beer would not perceptibly intoxicate a person. But it does not follow that such a beer is not an intoxicating beverage. Would any live doctor say that 10 glasses of 2¾ per cent beer would not intoxicate the average person—man or woman, boy or girl—consumed within two hours or even five hours? It probably has been the general observation that some persons may become drunk on a quantity of alcohol that would not perceptibly intoxicate some other person. This is not the question presented to us for our consideration and determination. We are bound, in all good conscience, here and now, to enact such laws for the enforcement of this eighteenth article of the Constitution as will meet the judgment of the people of this country and as is contemplated by this amendment.

There being no argument in favor of the saloon, there being no excuse for the liquor traffic, the same having become an outlawed business, and so considered by 90 per cent of the people of this country, I can furnish small excuse, if any, for detaining you at any great length. However, there is one question to which I desire to call your attention.

The professional bootlegger is by nature a criminal, and, as such, should be dealt with. The bootlegger is the villain who hands out the vilest of vile whisky to the boys of this country. He transacts his business in the back alleys and other out-of-the-way places; he is an animal in human form, but without humanity in his breast. He supplies the poor, weak man with that which kills. Fathers and mothers fear and loath this outlaw.

In this bill now under consideration there is no provision for enjoining the botlegger. It is true that criminal action may be instituted against him, but this is not sufficient. From my experience of more than 35 years as a lawyer and as a judge I know that the needs of society demand that the bootlegger be enjoined when he offends against the law. Under this bill as it now reads you may prosecute him criminally, but this means delay in many cases, which are unnecessary to enumerate at this time, as it is well understood by the layman as well as the lawyer that continuances are frequent, that juries do not always agree, and that sometimes even a bootlegger has sympathizers in the jury box. With this injunction once applied, you can take this traitor to humanity immediately upon his offending and dispose of him summarily, yet justly.

In view of my experience in handling the bootlegger, at the proper time I shall offer an amendment, and in order that the Members of this House may have time to consider the same I will now advise you of its contents, to wit:

SEC. —. That any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale of liquor, by himself, his employee, servant, or agent, for himself or any person, company, or corporation, keep or carry around on his person, or in a vehicle, or other conveyance whatsoever, or leave in a place for another to secure, any liquor, or who shall travel to solicit, or solicit, or take, or accept orders for the sale, shipment, or delivery of liquor in violation of this title is guilty of a nuisance, and may be restrained by injunction, temporary and permanent, from doing or continuing to do any of said acts or things and from otherwise violating the provisions of this title.

In such proceedings it shall not be necessary to show any intention on the part of the accused to continue such violations if the action is brought within 60 days following such violation of the law.

I desire to register my disagreement with the claims made upon this floor, that a man should be permitted to "live his own life." Such claim may receive indorsement when such life, or the opportunity for a certain mode of life, does not jeopardize the lives and the welfare of the many. This claim, in its broad sense, means license, not liberty. The individual who refuses to sacrifice a little for the good of the many is burdened with mistaken notions regarding his obligations to his neighbors, to his Government, and to the world.

I submit that the fair fame of labor and the good name and memory of the American soldier have been insulted, directly and by inuendo, in the effort to connect them, as great bodies of men, with those who stand guard in defense of the liquor traffic. [Applause.]

Mr. REBER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the constitutional amendment for prohibition has been adopted. There is no doubt but Congress should pass some law regarding the question of what is intoxicating liquor. But the provisions of this bill, in my judgment, will cause constant violations of the law. They are altogether too harsh, too drastic. I want to call to the attention of the committee a little colloquy that occurred on this floor on the 30th of December, 1918. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was speaking, and said, among other things, this:

Let me remind the gentleman that in all probability we would have to-day two saloons in this Capitol, as we did have for many years, if it had not been that the law which drove the whisky out of the Capitol was not brought in on a separate bill, but was ingrafted as legislation upon an immigration bill, and, as a matter of fact, was voted for in derision by a good many gentlemen.

Mr. KITCHIN said "it was put on as a sort of a joke."

Mr. CANNON then interrupted and said:

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion right there?

Mr. KITCHIN said "Yes."

Then Mr. CANNON continued:

My observation is that while they do not sell liquor down in the restaurant it is quite as easy to get liquor of any kind in the Capitol as it ever was.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not yield.

And there was not a single Member on the floor of this House——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KAHN. I will not yield. I have only 15 minutes.

And there was not a single gentleman on this floor that denied the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

I repeat, and the RECORD discloses the truth of my statement, that nobody arose on this floor on that occasion to deny the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion, and that is to cut out everything that was said out of order——

Mr. KAHN. I have only 15 minutes, and I desire to make a statement to the committee. This is an important matter. One can not begin to discuss it as it should be discussed in 15 minutes. Therefore I do not want to be interrupted. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of hypocrisy and cant and hysteria in this country. I have never yet been carried off my feet by the excitement or the emotional frenzy of the hour. I want to say here and now that I believe absolutely in temperance, and have always believed in it. I am not a drinking man. I do not drink liquor. There are thousands of men who drink infinitely more in one week than I in five years who are shouting their heads off to-day all over this country for prohibition. I do not question their motives. I do not question the motives of anyone. Everyone must solve these problems according to his own light and the dictates of his own conscience. And I have always had the courage of my own convictions on these questions.

I would not want to serve in Congress a single day if I felt I had to suppress my own views on a question that I considered to be one of fundamental principle in order to be reelected.

Mr. Chairman, there is a third party that ought to be considered in this legislation. I want to quote from William Graham Sumner, of Yale, a very able professor, who in 1884 wrote an essay "On the case of a certain man who is never thought of." I desire to quote at this time from that essay. He speaks of "The forgotten man":

The fallacy of all prohibitory, sumptuary, and moral legislation is the same. A and B determine to be teetotalers, which is often a wise determination and sometimes a necessary one. If A and B are moved by considerations which seem to them good, that is enough. But A and B put their heads together to get a law passed which shall force C to be a teetotaler for the sake of D, who is in danger of drinking too much. There is no pressure on A and B. They are having their own way, and they like it. There is rarely any pressure on D. He does not like it and evades it. The pressure all comes on C. The question then arises, Who is C? He is the man who wants alcoholic liquors for any honest purpose whatsoever, who would use his liberty without abusing it, who would occasion no public question, and trouble nobody at all. He is the forgotten man again, and as soon as he is drawn from his obscurity we see that he is just what each one of us ought to be.

I commend that to the careful consideration of every Member of this House. The biographer of Prof. Sumner informs us that he hated what is commonly known as "gush." What a world of it the professor would have encountered if he had had to listen to the debates on these questions in our days.

Mr. Chairman, I have always opposed prohibition legislation, for two reasons. In the first place, such legislation holds out to the peoples of the world an indictment of the American people. It holds them up as a nation of inebriates, who can not curb their appetites. I deny such to be the case. We are as sober as any nation on earth, and the attitude of 2,000,000 men in France, who were able to buy wine over there and other liquors as well, attests as powerfully as anything I might say on the subject the sobriety of the American citizen under any and every circumstance. [Applause.]

My second objection to such legislation is that it is a mistake to say that prohibition legislation makes for obedience to law. I contend that it leads to lawlessness. You all know that in every prohibition community in this country men violate the prohibition laws. They think it but a little thing to violate such a law. But it is only a step from the violation of what they deem a minor law to the violation of a more serious law.

Let me give you the statistics right here in the District of Columbia, the Nation's Capital, to emphasize what I say. I have here the records from the police court, over the signature of the clerk of that court. He says that the cases in the District branch of the police court are as follows for the period covered:

Cases filed in the District branch of the police court.

Jan. 1 to June 30, 1917	13,138
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1917	16,715
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1918	12,306
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1918	16,628
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1919	17,726

That is more than they ever had before here in the District of Columbia. The cases filed in the United States branch of the police court were as follows:

Jan. 1 to June 30, 1917	3,237
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1917	3,405
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1918	2,820
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1918	4,312
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1919	3,586

This statement is signed by F. A. Sebring, clerk of the police court of the District of Columbia. The collections for fines imposed in that court are equally interesting and enlightening about lawlessness. Here are the figures:

Cash received in the District branch of the police court.

Jan. 1 to June 30, 1917	$56,642.85
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1917	80,523.30
		137,166.15
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1918	70,351.04
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1918	97,364.45
		167,715.49
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1919	96,169.85

Cash received in the United States branch of the police court.

Jan. 1 to June 30, 1917	$12,556.45
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1917	15,832.23
		28,388.68
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1918	20,323.46
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1918	29,419.17
		49,742.63
Jan. 1 to June 30, 1919	33,341.73

That is a sum in excess of anything that has ever been collected for a like period in the history of the District of Columbia, I am told, and that statement of cash receipts is also signed by the clerk of the police court of the District of Columbia. So that the statement that is generally made that prohibition laws wipe out crime, here in the Nation's Capital at least, is not borne out by the facts. But in spite of what the records of the District of Columbia disclose I maintain emphatically that the overwhelming majority of Americans are peaceful and law-abiding.

This bill, of course, would prohibit the manufacture of wine. In my own State the wine industry represents an investment of anywhere between $100,000,000 to $150,000,000. That industry was fostered not only by the Federal Government, but by our State government. We have a viticultural commission which studied the question of the proper varieties of grapes for wine making. Our farmers and our vine growers were taught what varieties to raise. The Federal Government had experts who conducted experiment stations throughout the wine-growing regions of California to instruct our people what varieties were best suited to our soil and our climate. That industry has gone ahead. Thousands of citizens are engaged in it.

Under this bill not a pint of light wine can be manufactured in California. That whole industry is wiped out. Why, little Switzerland, when she undertook to wipe out the business of the manufacture and sale of one of the injurious liquors—absinthe—undertook to pay every man who was in that business for the loss he would sustain by reason of the destruction of his business. And yet gentlemen on this floor vote to wipe out a great industry of a great State, fostered by the Federal Government as well as the State government, without any compunction whatever. [Applause.]

The experience of other countries has shown that the drinking of wine and beer is not injurious to the welfare of the people of those countries. But, after all, as I have frequently repeated on this floor, it is not the use but the abuse of alcoholic stimulants that is injurious. I repeat what I have stated on previous occasions regarding prohibition legislation—that, in my opinion, those who can not control their appetites for stimulants will resort, under prohibition, to the use of habit-forming drugs. That is infinitely more harmful to a nation than the use of alcohol.

Men in authority in the large cities of the country have called attention to the fact that since the prohibition wave has begun to sweep over our country the drug habit has begun to increase enormously. Therefore, I say, let us have rational and not radical legislation regarding the use of alcoholic liquors.

I repeat what I said at the beginning of these remarks—that this proposed legislation is so severe and so drastic that if enacted as it has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary it will defeat its own ends.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was a Member of the Sixty-third Congress and voted against the Hobson prohibition resolution that came before this House for consideration at that time and which failed to get the necessary two-thirds vote. I voted against the submission of this resolution, and I voted against it because I believed the action of this House in favor of that submission constituted a dangerous invasion of the rights of the States and one which I fear will come back to plague that section of the country from which so many votes in its favor came and from that section of the country whose Members violated the principles of a lifetime—the principles and doctrine of State rights.

Already, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hear rumblings of what is to come, not only from the majority side of this Chamber but from this side as well, and it will be retributive justice. You can not violate a principle without suffering the effects that flow from such violation.

As for myself, I sincerely trust it will not come, and if a measure of that kind is submitted here it will not receive my vote.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], one of the able members of the Committee on Ways and Means, one of the best-posted men on finance and revenue, told this House the other day that the loss of revenue that will be occasioned will amount to $1,000,000,000. That loss will be sustained without any substantial benefit accruing to the country.

A great many of the Members who have preceded me have told us that you can not enforce an amendment of this kind, and that you can not enforce the strict provisions of this so-called enforcement act. We have heard that not only from men who are antiprohibitionists, but we have heard it from men who have been prohibitionists all their lives and have always voted for State prohibition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] told us about the conditions in Maine, close by his own State. I do not know why he went away up to Maine to find out the existence of conditions under prohibition. He could find them right here in the District of Columbia.

And in that connection I would like to read to the House just a portion of a letter written to the Baltimore Sun by a gentleman who in his day was one of the most noted journalists here in Washington, an observant man, a man not given to exaggeration. He is now retired. Let me read what he says about conditons here in the District of Columbia. He answers the statement that prohibition has bettered the conditions in the District, and he starts out by saying:

> Have they? Come over to Washington and see for yourself. In the last 12 months there have been more murders, more burglaries, more rapes, more pocketpicking, more holdups than in any similar period during the "wicked" era. The police force seems to have disappeared from the streets of the city. It is said they are scouring all the adjacent country roads in Maryland, chasing after pints of whisky in the pockets of bootleggers. Of late there is not an hour in the day or night that some crime is not committed in this city, and not minor offenses by any means. In one week there were five criminal assaults made on white women by negroes and not one offender caught. Women are almost afraid to venture out alone after dark.

A truthful picture of conditions in the District of Columbia since you forced prohibition down the throats of the people here without giving them an opportunity to be heard. You, Mr. Chairman, and I, and every Member of the last Congress, remember how that bill was brought in and how a gag rule was invoked, and how discussion was cut off, and not a man who opposed that bill was permitted to discuss it for a minute. Some of the ablest constitutional lawyers in this House have said that this bill is not constitutional. Oh, but, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not expect that to have any weight with these men in this House who are intent upon putting over on us this enforcement act. What, Mr. Chairman, is the Constitution among the followers and adherents of the Anti-Saloon League when they want to carry out their own purposes? I was very much pained the other day when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE], who, I believe, is a member of the Judiciary Committee—I am sorry he is not here to-day—took occasion in the course of his remarks to reflect upon people who came to Washington to exercise rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution to petition Congress. Here is the language he uses. He says:

The meeting held in front of the Capitol was for the purpose of intimidating Congress.

And he reflected upon the people who comprised that delegation. He said they appeared to have been foreign born. Has the time come when you are going to discriminate against a man because his forebears were born on the other side of the ocean? Are you going to pass one law for the native-born citizen and another for the naturalized citizen? In the early stages of the Great War, in the district I represent, in the great city of Baltimore, the sons of the foreign-born citizens did not wait for the draft. They enlisted at the outbreak of the war. They went into the Navy, they went into the Army, they went into the Marine Corps, and in many cases there were young boys under 18 who, for the purpose of supporting their country when it needed support, made false statements as to their ages to enable them to fight for the flag of their fathers' and mothers' adopted country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COADY. And yet, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we find a Member of this House reflecting upon people simply because they were born in another country, good naturalized citizens, because they came here to petition Congress. Ah, I said the sons of those men went to the front and fought, and one of the gentlemen who reflected upon these men, one of the Members of this House who reflected upon these citizens who came here exercising their lawful rights, while the boys of these foreign-born citizens were fighting and dying in France—that gentleman, a Member of this House, although within the draft age, and a strong and healthy man, was safely tucked away in his office here in Washington.

I listened to some of the gentlemen from Kansas tell about the wonders that prohibition has wrought there. I remember a few years ago reading about a banquet of the Kansas Society in New York City, and it was addressed by a then member of the United States Senate, not now a member of that body. Like nearly all Kansans when called upon to speak at affairs of that kind, he chose as his topic prohibition, and told about the wonders it had accomplished in his State—how the farmers had succeeded under it. But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, every member of that Kansas Society had left the dry State of Kansas, had gone to the wet State of New York, and there achieved fame and fortune. [Applause.]

We have abandoned legalized control of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, and as a result there is to-day, and will continue to be, an increased consumption of liquors—or, rather, of cheap and dangerous substitutes therefor. Right here in the city of Washington, as I pointed out before, there has been a shocking increase in the number of crimes committed since the District went dry.

This enforcement measure, which bears the name of the gentleman from Minnesota and which—it is alleged and not denied—was prepared by the counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, is the most drastic and most revolutionary measure ever presented to this body, and it has been characterized as such by some of the ablest men here—men who believe in prohibition and have voted for it, but who are alarmed, and rightly so, because it contains provisions that will permit an invasion of the sacred rights of the individual in his home.

It will greatly augment the political power of the Federal Government and will deal a death blow to the rights of the States.

The attempted enforcement of this amendment by the General Government will mean the employment of several hundred thousand men. I say attempted enforcement, because I believe you can not successfully enforce a law of this kind because of the antagonistic attitude toward it of a large part of our people.

You should leave to the several States the matter of enforcement. You submitted the amendment to the State legislatures, and they ratified it. Are we not now willing to trust the same States to enact enforcement legislation? They are best capable of dealing with the question. Are there any Members here unwilling to trust the legislature of the State they represent?

As for the war-time prohibition law, it was, in my opinion, the greatest legislative fraud ever perpetrated. There was never any sound reason for its passage. The idea of its being a food-conservation measure is pure nonsense, and we know that its Anti-Saloon League advocates had no such honest intent in demanding its passage. If they had, they would now favor its repeal. Their purpose was to anticipate the Federal amendment and make the country dry by legislative enactment, which they knew could not be done in times of peace. Every man here knows this. You did not mean to have this law continue when the reason you gave for its adoption has ceased to exist. Then let us be honest and repeal it. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is my purpose to give several reasons why I favor this legislation, but there is one thing which I wish to say first. I purposely refrain from being led into joining issue on, in, or by a surrejoinder or a surrebuttal, or any other such thing as the pitfalls surrounding the word "concurrent." I once got a hung jury in an important trial because I became involved, in the trial of that will case, in a 40-day fight over the question whether a wealthy old gentleman died of renal sclerosis or interstitial nephritis, and whether, therefore, he had lost his testimentary capacity, which sounds like a disease.

Dooley was right when he said to the faithful Hinnissey out on the Archie Road:

Ixpert tistimony, Hinnissey, is all in Latin and not understood by anny man at all, naythur the judge nor the jury, naythur the lawyers nor the doctors; and so the jury considers three things: Did Mr. Luetgert luke like a man that would kill his wife? Second, did Mrs. Luetgert luke like a woman that had ought to be killed? Third, is it about time for supper?

Seriously, my colleagues, the courts of this land, Federal and State, will give due force and effect, despite all mere verbiage, to the long-established canons of legal interpretation and judicial construction which have for a thousand years decreed that if the intention of the lawmaking power can be clearly ascertained, due effect shall be given to that intention. Let us not get lost in the fog. There is no fog in the mind of the American people [applause] and every court in America knows this. The contention so seriously put forth here that because the Constitution as amended by the eighteenth amendment gives Congress and the several States concurrent power to enforce it, that because of this the amendment can be nullified by any State refraining from enforcement, this contention was absolutely confuted, concisely and consummately, by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Judge SAUNDERS, on this floor yesterday.

To imagine that the amendment itself contemplates this nullification seems to me to simply arrive at that "reductio ad absurdum" abhorred eternally by all the law.

Here are my reasons for favoring this bill:

First, because I know that Illinois does not want this debate to close without one Illinois voice raised in favor of this bill. [Applause.] In other words, Illinois does want to be heard by at least one voice in favor of the bill, inasmuch as the only Illinois voice thus far heard has been against the bill, the voice of a Chicago Congressman. Illinois has spoken. Illinois has made plain its choice. I know Illinois. I know it as well as any man in the State. I know it well. I take no back talk on that. And I do not admit that Chicago is wet in a fair fight. I know that only 150,000 men and women voted "antisaloon" last April, while 406,000 voted against Chicago becoming "antisaloon" territory; but I also know that while 400,000 thus, in a way, voted wet, there was no fight, and I know that there were 825,000 registered voters—registered for that election—and so that 425,000 either voted dry or did not vote at all; and I know another thing, for I know that William Hale Thompson was elected mayor of Chicago April 5, 1915, by 147,000 majority [applause], and I know that on October 10, 1915, he ordered all the 7,700 saloons of Chicago to be closed on Sunday in order to comply with the old State law of Illinois, something no other mayor ever had the nerve to do; and everybody knows he was reelected April 1, 1919, by a rousing majority.

William Hale Thompson's opponent, George Sweitzer, said the next day in an interview in the Tribune, "The people in Chicago seem to have approved of the administration of William Hale Thompson." One of the first things this mayor did was to discover that no saloon had a right to open on Sunday, and he enforced his order and was reelected mayor of the city of Chicago. [Applause.]

It is fair to argue that Mayor Thompson's reelection was a ratification of his Sunday-closing stand, fully as fair as it is to parade the wet vote of that same date—April 1, 1919—when the only question was whether saloon licenses should be issued from April 1 to June 30, just three months.

Second, because I know, and know well, the kind of citizens—and aliens—that this law will have to deal with in Illinois, and I know, and know well, that the only way to make such people obey this law is to enforce it with a club—perform an operation with a club—just as Uncle Sam had to operate with a club upon the skull of Prussia. In my earlier days I served six years as a prosecuting attorney; four years as a judge; four years as a United States collector of internal revenue, with 100 men under me—clerks, deputies, gaugers, and storekeepers—and later I held the pardoning power of a great State for four years as governor. I know the various kinds of men who violate the law. When I was United States collector of internal revenue, collecting $12,000,000 a year from distillers, brewers, and wholesale and retail dealers—more than any district in America except the Peoria district—I knew good men among the distillers and brewers; I would trust some of them with my life, my fortune, and my sacred honor. I am not talking about them. I am talking about the violator. He is the man this law must reach—the man this bill must deal with—the mean, sneaky, lawless man, heeding no man's weakness and heeding no woman's tears. Why should he heed his country's Constitution or laws? He will not unless he has to. This law must have teeth, and plenty of them. You can not charm a hyena with kindness.

Third, because I know the laboring man of Illinois. I enjoy his confidence, and I know that I, yes I, represented him when I urged and passed the Illinois convict-labor law and other laws. I represented him then and I do now. Samuel Gompers does not. I know that I am representing him now as to prohibition as I stand here in my place in this House, and that Samuel Gompers does not, inasmuch as he has in recent days repeatedly and persistently given out the impression that the organized labor of America will seek, and does seek, either Bolshevism or beer—a misrepresentation of organized labor.

I have not his exact words, but I will insert them in the RECORD.

Why, Samuel Gompers once ordered that Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN be defeated, and L. Y. SHERMAN was elected and reelected and is United States Senator to-day. And Samuel Gompers once ordered that Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, be defeated, and when he got through beating "Uncle JOE"—well, "Uncle JOE" usually "romps home" with about 5,000 majority, but that time his majority was nearer 10,000.

This morning in the Congressional Library I took down what he said from the Chicago Tribune of November 5, 1886. That paper on that date quoted Mr. Gompers as saying:

> If these men are executed, it would simply give an impetus to the so-called revolutionary movement—

Those are very familiar words, are they not? They are very nearly the same words that he is quoted as using to-day. I repeat what he says:

> If these men are executed, it would simply give an impetus to the so-called revolutionary movement, which no other thing on earth can do. These men would, apart from any consideration of mercy, of humanity, be looked upon as martyrs.

Mr. Chairman, I represent 1,330,000 families in the State of Illinois, 1,330,000, but I do not go around bragging about it, and I do not pretend that I can control them all, but we have heard this same thing again and again, which I now quote further from Mr. Gompers's words:

> Thousands and hundreds of thousands of laboring men all over the country would consider that those men had been executed because they were standing up for free speech and free assemblage. We ask you, sir, to interpose your great power and prevent so dire a calamity.

Mr. Chairman, of course no one accuses Mr. Gompers of favoring dynamite. The Tribune says further:

> Mr. Gompers closed by saying the throwing of the bomb had destroyed the eight-hour movement.

That was a mistake. It did not destroy it. Of course, I do not charge, and neither did the Tribune, that Mr. Gompers advocated or favored the throwing of bombs. The point I make is that he, Mr. Gompers, when the red flag of anarchy was about to be buried 6 feet below the soil of Illinois, tried to inject the labor problem into a problem it did not belong to, and he made a mistake in so doing. He is making the same mistake now. He is trying to inject the labor problem into this prohibition problem, where it does not belong. No dire calamity happened then. The eight-hour law did go through. The laboring men of America did not rebel or resort to revolution then, and they will not do it now. [Applause.]

Fourth, because I know the Illinois that has gone dry in nearly all its counties, nearly all its cities, and nearly all its townships—the Illinois which again and again returned to the legislature a dry majority, sending dry men back again and again, and sending to the general assembly convening last January a big majority to ratify the national prohibition amendment January 14, 1919—is still "dry."

Fifth, because we must show our teeth. Unless we use "force without stint," this will be a "peace without victory"; it will, after all the effort and struggle and prayers and tears of the years, be a barren victory, be a result gratifying to nobody but the Kaiser and all others wishing the failure of the American experiment in free government. What an appalling humiliation and mortification to win the World War and then lose, after all, by destroying America's youth by a law with no teeth. There must be no turning back by Congress now in deference to the alluring cry of "fairness." Fairness is unknown to the citizens and aliens who will be the violators of this law. There is not a fair bone in their bodies. They do not know what fairness means. They are strangers to fairness and leniency and mercy. Each is a tyrant when on top and a whiner when the under dog. There is not a true sportsman, a dead-game sport, in all their number.

A noted writer once said:

> A true sportsman is a man who can endure success without undue elation and sustain defeat without complaint.

What a spectacle is to-day disclosed in this connection to the eye of "gods and men"! Who is it that has posed as the good sport—the dead-game sport? Why, the man in the liquor traffic. Who allured the American boy by the slogan, "Don't go to the Sunday school; don't seek the Y. M. C. A.; don't be a sissy; come to the thirst parlor; it is the rallying place of true sports—of dead-game sports"? Why, the liquor dealer. And who is whining now and complaining and lobbying and flirting with organized labor and putting forth every pitiful plea? Why, the man with liquor to sell. One firm writes me that the Government and he have been partners. That man may be an honest man. But what a partnership has always been that between Uncle Sam and booze. Ye immortal gods, what a plea; what a partnership! Would you care to know what made Springfield, Ill., go dry—remembering the partnership plea? Five years ago 29,000 Illinois troops arrived at Springfield and went into camp at the State fair grounds and Camp Lincoln on their way to the Mexican border. That morning in every paper in Springfield there appeared numerous flaming advertisements something like this:

> Brave sons of Illinois,
> Noble defenders of the Union,
> Don't forget the Bismarck.
> Remember the Annex, the Edelweiss.
> Budweiser on tap.

Hundreds of glorious boys came to town to a hundred barrooms and got drunk and went to Texas well started on the downward road to destruction by the demon rum, and not a few of them made rotten and diseased for life. Partners, indeed! Partners of Uncle Sam, who poisoned his sons. Well, all I have got to say is when I find my partner has poisoned my son, I intend to kill my partner; he shall not poison my son and still breathe the breath of life. I will kill him if I die in the attempt.

And make no mistake. Uncle Sam is going to kill John Barleycorn and bury him deep.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer. A large part of the discussion of this bill, as it relates to the constitutional power of the Congress to enact this legislation, makes me feel reconciled to my lack of legal knowledge. It has been asserted many times during the debate that Congress has not the power to enact a prohibitory statute until the constitutional amendment providing for a dry Nation goes into effect next January.

STATUS IN UTAH.

I recall that in my own State of Utah statutory prohibition preceded the adoption of an amendment to the State constitution, although such an amendment was adopted overwhelmingly as soon as the people were allowed to vote upon the matter. I think that has usually been the manner in which this question has developed in other States also. Once the people have come to feel the benefits of this great moral movement of reform, they have proceeded to place the question beyond the power of shifting and uncertain action by political parties. But the guardians of the Constitution immediately cry out that the States, in this action, have only exercised their proper police power, and claim that this proposed action by the Congress is an invasion of the police power of the State.

In this connection it is interesting to note that no voice has been raised here against the police power of the States being invaded by the National Government assuming jurisdiction over the sale of other deadly drugs. There has been no protest against the National Government enforcing police regulations regarding the quarantine and public-health laws of the Nation. If the victims of the curse of alcoholism and light wines and beer could stand up and be counted they would outnumber many times those who have benefited by the enforcement of the laws designed to control drugs and otherwise conserve the public health.

I am not so much alarmed about the Constitution as I am about the souls of men. The Constitution was made for the people; and when special interests come here and use it as a cloak to defend the most infamous curse to humanity to-day it is time for men to assert the right of the people of America to make and enforce a law designed to promote the welfare of this and all succeeding generations.

ALREADY IN THE CONSTITUTION.

But, Mr. Chairman, this contention of the advocates of license seems the more indefensible to me since national prohibition is already a part of the Constitution. The eighteenth amendment was submitted to the States by the last Congress, and in less than one year 45 of the 48 States had adopted it. It is true the amendment provided for enforcement after January 1 next, but in the meantime war-time prohibition had been enacted by the Congress and is now a part of the law of the land. It must remain the law until the military forces are demobilized, and the President, under whose authority demobilization must be proclaimed, has given us to understand that that can not be effected before the first of the year and at that time the prohibition amendment becomes effective.

Therefore this situation prevails to-day: We have war-time prohibition in force now, which we know must remain in force until after the constitutional amendment becomes effective, and after that date the amendment itself imposes upon Congress the obligation of passing the necessary laws to carry it into effect.

Small regard as I have for the contention that we have not yet gained jurisdiction of this matter, it is still more difficult to have patience with the contention that wet States without enforcement laws will not be subject to the national laws we enact to-day, because the amendment states Congress and the several States "shall have concurrent power" to enforce the law. If that is true, a more infamous joker was never written into a national statute.

The opponents of this measure come here and say they were careful to see to it that the wording of the amendment left their States free to license the saloon, because they could and would successfully resist in those States the necessary "concurrent" enforcement laws. I can not believe such a contention can be maintained. Surely the authority of the Constitution extends to every State alike. It might as well be maintained that the suffrage amendment would not apply to those States which chose to resist the right of women to vote. At any rate no man will contend that violations of the prohibition amendment can not be punished in every part of the Union in the Federal courts, just as counterfeiting is now punished in those courts.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the owner of a saloon, who stands behind a bar and robs men of their reason by pouring a flood of liquor through an addled brain, is an infinitely greater menace to society than the man who exchanges counterfeit money for the coin of the realm.

> Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him
> And makes me poor indeed.

It is interesting to note the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the same objection urged by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA]. They tell us their people do not want this law. It is a singular thing that both California and Massachusetts have by large majorities in their legislatures adopted the prohibition amendment. These gentlemen assert that the legislatures did not represent the will of the people, but that they do represent their people. In this confusion of counsel, it seems to me the Congress is bound to be influenced by the official action of the States themselves and not take too seriously the protestations of their representatives upon this floor.

I can not agree to the theory that the wine and liquor industry of the country has not been given proper and deliberate notice that this legislation would be enacted. We placed them on notice when the constitutional amendment was submitted to the States, and that notice was confirmed when the States—their States included—adopted the amendment and made it an effective portion of the Constitution of our country. It comes with poor grace to-day for the wine growers of California or the wine merchants of Massachusetts to come here and ask for an extension of time in which to pour this stream of poison into the currents of our national life.

ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH.

Gentlemen of the House, it is impossible for you to resist the onward march of this reform. The infamy of the open saloon and the curse of the liquor traffic has been denounced by the Christian churches of America for 100 years. Their voice crying in the wilderness has called upon the Nation to drive out the demons of rum.

ATTITUDE OF BUSINESS.

Prohibition is to-day a part of the industrial fabric of successful business in every line of industry and trade. The railroads have cast out the saloon. And I am glad to know that workmen as well as operators in that great industry have come to feel that success depends upon sobriety. The merchant and the banker practice prohibition in their business, and those who come to them laden with the fumes of liquor are totally discredited as employees and rejected as associates in the industries which they represent.

The athlete in training has the sense to be a prohibitionist if he wishes to conserve his physical strength. The training table of every school in the land is for the strict enforcement of prohibitory law.

The medical profession has abandoned its use of liquor, realizing that the evils of whisky many times outweigh any benefits derived from the use of the poison it contains as a stimulant or a drug.

ATTITUDE OF THE ARMY.

The Army and the Navy have put a ban upon the use of liquor by men in the service of America. These instruments of our power have come to realize that those who defend this Nation upon the sea and upon the land must be free from the curse of strong drink. No matter how willing gentlemen here are that their constituents should make and sell booze, they have joined us in demanding that our soldiers and sailors should go to battle with brains clear—the best and surest protection against the dangers of the battle field. The Army and the Navy have themselves adopted and by their example urge its adoption upon the country as a whole.

INFLUENCE OF THE HOME.

But all these agencies together have suffered less than the home from the liquor business. The American home is for this law. Every wife and mother in the land applauds the action this House is now about to take. Every child in the home is glad to have the fear of this peril lifted from his life. And, gentlemen, the American home is the greatest bulwark of American liberty to-day. If you would preserve your country and hand down a heritage worthy of our destiny to future generations, we must keep secure and sacred the stream from which is pouring the future citizenship of our country.

I am for this bill, and when it is discussed under the rule providing for amendment I trust such changes as are made will tend to make the legislation more effective by making the enforcement provisions more drastic than the present bill provides. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], a member of the committee.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] for granting me time on this bill. It has been quite difficult for me to secure any time, although I happen to be a member of the committee. I asked the chairman of the committee to grant me 20 minutes, and I made a clear and full statement of my position on the bill. He said he would give it to me, but the next day he said he had changed his mind, and he said to me, "You are wet, and you can not fool anybody." I have no desire to fool the chairman of this committee or to fool any Member of this House. If to be opposed to what I consider to be some of the unwise and radical provisions of this bill is to be wet, then I am as wet as the waves of the sea, but if to be in favor of an honest, conscientious enforcement of the provisions of the eighteenth amendment is to be dry, then I am as dry as the sands of the desert.

I do not intend to discuss the constitutional questions raised under this bill, except to say that in my poor opinion I believe we can go as far as we please in defining the words "intoxicating liquor" to carry out the constitutional purpose, but I do not believe we can go any distance at all to defeat it. If we provided in the bill, for example, that only beverages containing 10 per cent or more of alcohol were intoxicating, I am sure the courts would set it aside as a barefaced attempt to defeat the constitutional purpose, but I think we can go as far as we please the other way. We could provide for one-half of 1 per cent, one-tenth of 1 per cent, or we could eliminate all alcohol if we deemed it necesssary to effectuate the constitutional purpose, and I am satisfied the courts would not inquire into that necessity.

The question of concurrent power raises a more difficult question. I think the word "concurrent" was very poorly chosen, but I am satisfied that the courts would hold that the word "concurrent" as used in the text of the constitutional amendment means that the Federal Government and each State has complete and separate power to enforce this provision.

I desire to discuss this question from a practical standpoint. The bill comes before us under three titles. The first is a code to enforce the war-prohibition act. As long as that war-prohibition act remains on the statute books unrepealed I am in favor of enforcing it, and I am very sorry that we have gone 15 days without any enforcement legislation. I was one of the members of the committee who voted to separate this bill, and to bring in a war-prohibition enforcement measure, so that the condition of chaos might not exist which does now exist in the country. I am also of the opinion that the war-prohibition act should be repealed. I feel that we have no right to project into times of peace the operation of a measure which was brought into existence solely through the exercise of the war power and for war purposes only. I feel it can be justified only upon the theory that the end justifies the means, and that is pretty shaky ground to stand on, even when dealing with the great question of temperance. I think it should be repealed also for this reason: It is unjust to the men in the liquor business.

This House wrote into the constitutional amendment the one-year limitation for the purpose of affording to the men in the liquor business a period for adjustment and settlement of their affairs. That limitation was in there when the joint resolution passed Congress. It was in there when it was ratified by the States, and it is just as much a part of the constitutional amendment as any other part. It should be enforced just as honestly as any other part of the constitutional amendment, when it is safe to enforce it, and the President of the United States has said that it is safe to enforce it now.

With respect to the second title, which is a code to enforce the constitutional provision, I want to say that I was absent in France when the joint resolution was adopted in this House.

During my absence I was paired as being in favor of it without instruction from me, however, or knowledge of my attitude. If I had been here I would probably have voted to submit the question to the people, although I have very strong convictions that it is a question which should be left to the individual States under our theory of government. But the constitutional amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States, and, as I said before, it should be honestly and conscientiously carried out. I do not feel, however, that we are duty bound to go beyond the constitutional amendment, and I think this bill does go way beyond it. The bill provides that beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent are intoxicating liquors. Now, everybody knows that they are not intoxicating liquors, and that liquors containing a considerably greater percentage of alcohol would not be intoxicating liquors. I do not know where the truth lies. It perhaps lies somewhere between 1½ and 3½ per cent. In the New York case, in which Senator Elihu Root and William D. Guthrie were counsel, contention was made that 2.75 per cent beer by weight was not an intoxicating liquor, and was absolutely incapable of producing the alcoholic habit in anybody.

The contention in that case was strongly supported by the testimony of eminent scientific experts, and also by the testimony of practical men who had wide experience in dealing with alcoholic patients. I will not say that that contention is correct. I will not claim that 2¾ per cent beer is not intoxicating, but for the purposes of my argument I am going to assume that it is not intoxicating, and that it is incapable of causing the alcohol habit in anybody. If this assumption is correct, then there are numerous and substantial reasons why its manufacture and sale should be permitted. First, for the preservation of property interests. You can not maintain the wine business of California and New York on grape juice and denatured wine. To the average palate they are not agreeable. The amount consumed is not sufficient. The same is true of the great brewery properties in which an investment of millions of dollars has been made. They could not be maintained upon near beer because it is not agreeable to the palates of enough people. A good cup of tea is a social drink, but I defy anybody to cheer up on a glass of near beer, a glass of grape juice, or a glass of denatured wine. Most people do not like it. If you have got to depend upon that demand, the wine business will go out of existence. The breweries will go out of existence. My second reason is for the purposes of taxation and revenue. If you allow absolutely nonintoxicating wines and beer to be sold which can not produce the alcohol habit in anybody, you can dispose of the product and you can gain a lot of revenue for the Treasury, which is not to be despised under present conditions. The third reason is to satisfy the demands of a large, perfectly sober, and respectable element of the community who want light wine or beer with a small alcohol content. This demand should not be disregarded if it can be safely met. The fourth reason is in the interest of true temperance itself. Absolute bone-dry prohibition has never been secured anywhere in the world, and in my opinion it never can be. Alcohol is one of the commonest products of nature, and it is too easily separated. You can pass all the acts you want, but you will never stop a man from squeezing apples if he wants to, and you will never stop nature from working the process of fermentation in the barrel. The average American citizen wants to obey the law, and he will obey the law if you do not make it too oppressive, if you do not invade what he considers his natural rights. He does consider it an invasion of his natural rights to prohibit him from drinking any kind of nonintoxicating beverage that is incapable of producing the liquor habit. We do not want to encourage, if we can help it, the practice of law evasion which notoriously exists in the so-called dry States.

Now, on the other hand, let us assume that 2¾ per cent beer is intoxicating. It is certainly only mildly intoxicating. You have gotten rid of the brandy, you have gotten rid of the whisky, you have gotten rid of the rum and the gin, the strong wines and strong beers, and you have nothing left but a very mild wine or beer. Now, Congress is going to remain in existence, and we can legislate on this subject at any time. We can observe the result of permitting the sale of these light wines and beers. If it does any harm, if any bad results whatever should flow from its use, we could reduce the alcoholic content or we could absolutely eliminate it if necessary to carry out the provisions of the eighteenth amendment. And there is another reason why we should go slowly. This is a general bill. It applies to all the States throughout the Union; to many States that have never had prohibition. We should pass a bill which is generally satisfactory to the people of all the States. I think it is a good deal better to be a little liberal at the start, and then tighten up as circumstances require than it is to start in and cut everything off right behind the ears. Such a course is bound to produce a reaction that will make this whole liquor question an issue in every congressional campaign until a reasonable settlement is effected. The liquor question can be settled now under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, but it will never be settled under the terms of this legislation. The bill is not practical, enforceable, or satisfactory to the people of the country and would create a condition of law evasion and violation which is highly undesirable and wholly unnecessary. I desire now to call your attention to some of the radical provisions of this bill, which, in my opinion, would not be necessary if you do not attempt to get absolutely bone-dry prohibition. It would not be necessary if you permit the sale of a nonintoxicating wine or beer which could not create the alcohol habit in anybody. I call your attention to section 4, page 10, of the bill. The astonishing limitations of that section are not as bad as they were when the bill first came before the committee. It then provided that every one of these exempted articles could not be used unless it was nonpotable and incapable of being used for beverage purposes. After they talked the matter over with the representatives of the various interests affected, and after they talked it over with the representatives of the departments of this Government, the committee made up their mind that if that language was retained none of those products could be used, and so they amended it by providing in some cases that they could be used unless they were "unfit" for use as a beverage, and they cut out the limitations about vinegar, although one member of the committee suggested that a very insidious drink had been made out of vinegar called, I believe, vinegar shrub.

Now, I want to call your attention to the fact that these limitations are in here solely for the purpose of preventing people from getting intoxicated on denatured rum, on medical preparations, unpatented and patented, and proprietary medicines, on toilet articles and antiseptic preparations, on flavoring extracts and on vinegar. I want to assure you in the so-called wet States these beverages have never become popular. Bay rum and vinegar and lemon extract have never become popular drinks in the State of New York, but I understand they are popular drinks in all the so-called bone-dry States. And this legislation would not be necessary and the people would not resort to these injurious substitutes if you permitted the sale of a mild beer or a mild wine that is nonintoxicating and incapable of producing the alcoholic habit in anybody. The fact that you go to such extremes is clear proof that there is something radically wrong with the law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Do you mean to say that in your State, for instance, they can make those things without any regulation at all?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not say they would make them without any regulation. But I say this, that no regulation to prevent their use as intoxicating beverages would be necessary in the State of New York.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But you have the regulation, just the same.

Mr. HUSTED. No regulations in that regard.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You have regulations in reference to it.

Mr. HUSTED. No regulations to prevent their use as intoxicating liquors.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, yes; you have.

Mr. HUSTED. Well, I am not aware of them if there are any such regulations. I would be glad to have them called to my attention.

I want to direct your attention now to sections 6 and 7, pages 12 and 13. These sections provide that no man can get a drink of whisky for medical purposes unless it is prescribed by a physician in active practice, and he can not get it then except from a pharmacist who has been duly licensed and on blanks which have been furnished by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Now, I have no objection to that, so far as it goes, but I want to point out this fact to you, that in a mining camp or in a lumber camp or in an exploration expedition or in the case of a party camping in the wilderness if an epidemic of pneumonia or of influenza broke out they could not get a drink of whisky as medicine unless they had with them a physician in active practice and unless they also had with them a duly licensed pharmacist.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does not the gentleman know that the National Pharmacopœia, which is the official list of recognized drugs and medicines of value in the treatment of disease, does not include brandy, whisky, wine, or beer?

Mr. HUSTED. Well, I was not aware of it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is a fact.

Mr. HUSTED. But I do know this, that one of the most distinguished physicians died three days ago in the city of New York, Dr. Abraham Jacobi, and I know he said that he would not assume the responsibility of treating a pneumonia case unless he had good old whisky at his disposal.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Is not the gentleman aware that the Secretary of the Navy accepted from the mayor of Seattle 6,500 quarts of whisky for medicinal purposes, to be used in the Navy?

Mr. HUSTED. I did not know that, but I understood a great deal was actually used.

I am going to pass over a number of sections whose provisions should be amended in order to make the bill practical, because I know my time is drawing to a close.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, there are a great many Members of the House who desire to make speeches on one side or the other of this very important measure, and the time of each speaker is necessarily short. I regret that my time is limited, as I should like to speak on this question more at length. I feel myself fortunate, however, in having an opportunity to answer some of the objections advanced against the bill and to offer some reasons which seem sound to me in favor of the passage of this bill. It is claimed by the "wets" that (1) the laboring men of our country are opposed to prohibition; (2) our soldiers in the recent World War are "wet" and are opposed to prohibition; (3) the proposed law is unconstitutional; Congress does not have the power to provide the means for the enforcement under the war-time prohibition act and under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution; (4) light wines and beer are harmless; (5) it is urged by some Democrats that President Wilson will veto this bill if it is passed by Congress; (6) prohibition increases crime.

I desire to take up these propositions in the order in which they are stated and discuss them briefly.

The "wets" are making their last stand in the great fight against prohibition. The purpose of this bill is to make America dry in fact as well as in name, so far as the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are concerned as a beverage, and to furnish effective means for carrying out the war-time prohibition acts and the action of the States in ratifying and approving the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Soon after Congress had passed the war-time prohibition act the German brewers of the country began to organize for their final fight. They knew the great influence and power of organized labor and the National Army in the World War, and it is not strange that the German brewers made a desperate effort to hook their beer wagon to the laboring man and soldiers of the country. If they could secure the backing of these two mighty forces, it would mean much to the success of their cause, and acting under this plan it was the German brewers who invented the slogan "No beer, no work" for the laboring men of the country. They got the laboring men in a certain town in New Jersey, largely made up of foreigners, to in a way adopt this slogan and the brewers filled the newspapers of the country with the threat that unless the laboring men got their beer that there would be a Nation-wide strike and every form of business would be paralyzed. As we all know, the 14th of June of each year is Flag Day throughout the Nation. The Hun brewers began to organize that part of union labor that is largely engaged in the liquor business to meet in Washington on Flag Day to make the so-called protest to Congress against prohibition. It was stated far and wide in the "wet" papers that there would be about 250,000 laboring men march to the city of Washington and join in this protest. So, in accordance with the plan of the German brewers, on the 14th of June, or Flag Day, a number of laboring men met on the Capitol steps here to protest, as they claim, against the passage of this bill. It was claimed in the "wet" papers that there were 50,000 men in the line of march and in this protest meeting. This is not true. I saw the persons in the march, and I do not believe that there were more than 5,000, if there were that many. These came principally from the near-by notoriously "wet" city of Baltimore, from New York, and other "wet" cities.

Mr. E. W. Oyster, one of the leading labor men of Washington, stated before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate that there were only about 4,800 persons in the parade, and that the union-labor men of the District of Columbia did not participate. Mr. Oyster also stated that those who have adopted the slogan, "No beer, no work," are working in the interest of the German brewers; that the so-called protest is all a part of the Hun propaganda. He also states that it is a gross mistake to say that organized labor was unanimously opposed to prohibition. Members of the trades-union are divided upon this question, just as other persons are. At this so-called protest meeting the slogan, "No beer, no work," was very much in evidence. Gentlemen of the Congress, I desire here now to resent the insult offered to American workingmen wherein it is claimed that if they do not get their beer that they will not work. This is not an American doctrine; it is not the sentiment of the American workingmen. We find the protest to prohibition most pronounced in the cities of New York, Chicago, Baltimore, and so forth, where there is a large foreign population, and these foreign laborers, most of them, are opposed to prohibition, and the German brewers have organized them in a way to help them fight prohibition. In rural communities and in the central, southern, and western parts of our country, with the population made up almost entirely of Americans, the sentiment is overwhelmingly in favor of prohibition. The eleventh district of Kentucky, which I have the very great honor to represent, is made up largely of laboring men and working people. There are thousands of union miners and union railroad men. I am proud to say that I represent a district where there could not be found a laboring man who indorses the doctrine of "no beer, no work." The man who really believes that and acts upon it places his liquor above his wife, his children, his home, his church, and his country.

The man who would refuse to work, to feed and clothe his family, provide for his home, support his church, and back his country in her great struggle in reconstruction because he can not get his beer is a poor excuse, indeed, of a citizen, and he is a man who would have but very little influence in any community. It would matter little with his neighbors what he thought or what his opinion might be on any question. It is true that we have men in my district who like to take a glass of beer or a drink of whisky, but I thank God that no laboring man in my district places his beer above and beyond his wife, his children, his home, his church, and country. I doubt if there is one man out of ten of the laboring men of my district that would vote wet if he had an opportunity. It is the laboring men of my district that helped to vote liquor out years ago. They are just as clean, pure in their lives, and as devoted to their children, their wives, their homes, and just as loyal to their country, and as much opposed to anything that breeds crime or endangers the home, the church, or the Nation, as are the farmers, the business or professional men of my district, and I resent most vigorously the insinuation or the charge that the laboring men must have their liquor or that they will refuse to work or will become Bolsheviki and overturn this Government. The trouble is that these fellows who are crying "No beer, no work," in the main are foreigners and are not in sympathy with this country or its ideals, and we can not legislate to satisfy them and thereby ignore the wishes of the great body of Americans. [Applause.]

At this same so-called protest meeting on the Capitol steps Mrs. E. Rooney, of Baltimore, led a bunch of feminine wets. She jumped on the speaker's table and shouted, "I have organized the ladies auxiliary of the Personal Liberty League, and we are going to get liberty or going to hell," meaning, of course, that she and her associates were willing to go to hell to get their liquor. No one who heard that statement but felt with a great sense of shame that any part of the womanhood of this country should be prostituted to such an unholy cause and would make such an outrageous declaration. The conduct of this woman is enough to cause every true mother and sister of our great country to hang their heads in shame. It is needless to say that Mrs. Rooney's remarks stiffened the backbone of every Member of Congress who is opposed to the liquor traffic in this country. No one could have made me believe that there could be found in our country a woman who would make a public declaration like this.

I can truthfully say that we have no woman in the eleventh congressional district of Kentucky who would publicly or privately make the statement that she would have her liquor if she had to go to hell to get it. Indeed, no such woman could be found in the great Commonwealth of Kentucky. The German brewers, who were much in evidence in this meeting when Mrs. Rooney made her statement, and when other speakers declared "No beer, no work," cheered loudly and lustily.

All of us who love the children of America, who believe in the sancity of our homes, who believe in the great mission of the school and church, and the destiny of this Republic, rejoice that these are not the sentiments of the vast majority of the laboring men and the womanhood of America. [Applause.]

It is believed by most of us that many people go to hell by getting too much liquor, but this is the first time that any public speaker has declared that he would go to hell to get liquor.

I have had hundreds of requests from my district to support this bill, but no man, woman, child, society, association, business, social or political, has asked me to vote against this bill. This makes me feel very proud of my district.

The claim that the American soldier is opposed to prohibition and is lined up with the German brewers in this fight is unfounded, and is an insult to the boys who won the world war. It is admitted by the world that we sent to the camps and to the battle fields in Europe the cleanest and finest army that marched under any flag. We took them from the farm, the railroad, the shop, the mine, the store, the bank, the school, and the church. During the short recess of Congress I had an opportunity to visit a number of the counties of my district, and I talked to hundreds of laboring men and soldiers. These same laboring men and soldiers helped to vote liquor out of every county, town, and village in the eleventh congressional district of Kentucky. In some counties and towns they voted liquor out 40 years ago. The only change that I found in their views was that they are now more unanimously opposed to the liquor traffic than at the time they voted it out, and are more determined to make our country dry, and to make effective the act of Congress and the States in the passage and ratification of the eighteenth amendment. The soldier boys have come back, and have taken their places on the farm, on the railroad, in the shops, the store, the bank, the school, the mines, and the churches. They were the leaders in the best thought and the highest ideals before they entered the Army.

If anything, they have come back to us stronger, cleaner, better, and more thoughtful. They will continue to lead in all that is best in American business and in American political and social life. If war has made drunkards out of our soldier boys, as some of the opponents to this bill would indicate, we have paid dearly, indeed, for our part in the world struggle. The American soldier gave too much for his country to now join hands with the German brewers to help keep alive a business to destroy their own children, to help pull down the churches and schools of our country. The soldier will never do it, and I desire to emphasize my resentment of the slander of the American soldier by the brewing interests in claiming that the American soldier is opposed to prohibition and wants liquor. [Applause.] It is claimed by the opponents of this bill that the courts will declare it to be unconstitutional; that Congress has not the power to define what are intoxicating liquors. In the uniform enforcement of this proposed law, it is very essential for Congress to define what are intoxicating beverages. Some contend that alcoholic liquors are those liquors that contain a sufficient quantity of alcohol to intoxicate a person if he drinks a reasonable amount of it. Others claim that any beverage is an alcoholic liquor that contains alcohol. The latter definition is the better. Some claim that it requires 4 per cent alcohol to make an alcoholic beverage, while others claim 3 per cent, and so on down. As to the effect it has on certain individuals, that is not a safe guide or comprehensive definition. Some men can drink a quart of whisky and still keep on their feet and show very little sign of intoxication, while some others would be thrown on their heads if they took a fourth of a gill of whisky. Some men can fill themselves up with beer and show no signs of intoxication, while a single glass will intoxicate others.

A beverage containing 4 per cent alcohol or 2.75 per cent alcohol would not intoxicate some men, yet others may become beastly drunk on such a beverage. In the trial for the violation of this proposed law some courts would take one view, another court would take another view, as they have in the past. Some witnesses would testify that a certain beverage would intoxicate, and many others would testify that it would not intoxicate, as we have seen it done in many cases in our practice as lawyers. This has brought about endless confusion, and under national prohibition this confusion would be greatly increased. We can therefore see the very great wisdom in Congress defining what is an alcoholic beverage. Those who are in favor of prohibition and have brought out this bill favor a one-half of 1 per cent, while the wets want us to declare that no beverage or liquor that contains not more than 2¾ per cent alcohol is not an intoxicating beverage or liquor.

I strongly favor the terms of this bill, which defines an intoxicating beverage or liquor as any beverage or liquor that contains more than one-half of 1 per cent. It is the universal opinion that one-half of 1 per cent will not intoxicate, while the general consensus of opinion is that 2¾ per cent will intoxicate practically every person who is not accustomed to drinking and many persons who are accustomed to drinking intoxicating liquors.

Many of the States that have heretofore adopted prohibition have by the acts of their legislature declared that any beverage containing more than one-half of 1 per cent is an intoxicating liquor. These laws have been upheld by the highest courts in said States. If the States have the power and right to define what is an intoxicating beverage or liquor Congress undoubtedly has this right. The Federal courts have upheld the action of these States and many of the Federal courts have already upheld the war-time prohibition act of Congress. There can be no doubt but that Congress has the power to define what is an intoxicating beverage or liquor. With this provision in the law national prohibition will become a reality. Without this provision it would be more or less a farce. Congress has heretofore voted in favor of prohibition; 45 of the 48 States have already ratified the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution—the prohibition amendment. We should adopt the provisions of this bill in defining intoxicating beverages and liquors and thereby make the action heretofore taken by Congress and the approval by the States effective.

Some of the wets have stated on the floor of the House that this proposed law would prevent farmers and housewives from making ciders and grape juice. I do not take this view of it. This would be true if they should make alcoholic liquors. If cider and grape juice are fermented, they will, of course, make alcoholic liquors. This law will prevent that. A great deal of alcoholic liquor comes from the fermentation process of grapes, apples, and other fruits. If we should fail to provide against the making of alcoholic liquors with these fruits, the prohibition law would be a farce.

The opponents of this measure have made a strong appeal to save beer and wine. They say that they are opposed to the manufacture of distilled liquors, such as whisky, rum, and so forth. I imagine that most of them are recent converts. Many of them, a few years ago, were arguing for all kinds of alcoholic liquors.

We read from Holy Writ that it was wine that made the Jewish nation, for a time at least, a nation of drunkards, and was one of the great factors in the downfall of that nation. It was beer and wine, we are told in history, that were more responsible than any other cause for the fall of the mighty Roman Empire. And it was wine that had more to do than any other one thing with the overthrow of the powerful Grecian nation. It was fermented liquors, such as wine and beer, that filled the early nations with drunkards and destroyed the moral fiber of said nations and brought about their downfall. Distilled liquors, such as whisky, rum, and so forth, were unknown. Now the wets undertake to tell us that wine and beer are harmless and want us to adopt as a national beverage that which destroyed the early nations. We do not have to depend, however, upon the Jewish, Grecian, or Roman nations for testimony as to the evil effects of beer and wine. Germany has been a beer-soaked country for more than 50 years. Many careful writers have pointed out that the brutality of German soldiers was largely due to this condition, and that Germany lost her soul in her beer vats and mugs. When we talk with our soldier boys, we learn much as to the evil effects of wine drinking on the French Nation. We have seen the evil effects of beer and wine drinking in our own country. The greatest doctors and scientists of this country tell us that beer is more harmful to the health than whisky. A constant beer drinker can not resist disease.

Again, if we should keep beer and wine, we must keep the saloon. The 2¾ per cent beverages would keep alive the saloons and groggeries of the country. The American people are determined to get rid of the saloon. If we keep beer and wine, or 2¾ per cent alcoholic beverages, we continue to cultivate the appetite for intoxicating liquors. It is not my purpose so much to correct the habits of men advanced in years. Perhaps this can not be done. But I want to protect the new crop of Americans that are coming on. We want to save the future generations from the curse of drunkenness and a drunkard's hell.

If we keep beer and wine, or a 2¾ per cent alcoholic beverage, we shall continue to have drunkenness in America. America wants to do away with drunkenness. The States have said by their ratification of the prohibition amendment that they want Congress to go ahead and give us a dry Nation. Let us not disappoint the hopes of the people of the 45 great States. Of course there are people in the country that are opposed to prohibition. There never was any important question before the American people in which they were all of one mind. Many people opposed our separation from England; many opposed the emancipation of the colored man; and many opposed the war with Germany. We do know that a substantial majority of the American people want prohibition, and it is up to us to make effective the wish and will of this substantial majority.

The charge has been made on the floor of this House, to my very great surprise, that prohibition fosters crime. I have before me the signed statements of the governors of every State that has adopted prohibition, the mayors of every city that is under prohibition, and the leading men of these prohibition States and cities, and they with one accord declare that there has been a tremendous decrease in crime since prohibition became effective in their respective States, cities, and so forth.

The chief of detectives of the great city of Chicago says that crime has been decreased there by half. To the same effect is the statement of the officials of the city of Milwaukee. We who live in prohibition sections know that prohibition does not increase crime, but, on the contrary, it practically eliminates crime. As a lawyer, I have been on one side or the other in more than threescore homicide trials in my State; and all of these killings, except about two, were traceable to intoxicating liquor. And when we have a dry Nation homicide will be practically unknown.

Prohibition will not hurt business. It takes about $10,000 invested in the liquor business to furnish one man employment. This sum invested in other industries furnishes six men employment. With liquor out of the way, we will have better schools, better churches—better clothed, better housed, and better fed wives and children—for hundreds of thousands of women and children in this country.

Intoxicating liquors have every year been destroying more men than we lost altogether in the great World War. If I had 24 sons, I would much rather that 23 of them should fall in the front-line trenches upholding the flag of our country than that one of them should fall in the front-line trenches of booze.

If those who favor wets could show me where liquor ever built a real home, a school, a church, a man, or woman, I might be inclined to give it more consideration. We can point to millions of men and women, thousands of homes, churches, and schools that it has pulled down and destroyed. There is nothing constructive about the saloon or liquor. One word defines it all—destruction.

It has been intimated by some of the wet Democrats that President Wilson would veto this bill. I think it would be unfortunate for the country if he should take this action; and, if he does take such action, I feel confident that Congress will pass the bill over his veto. There has been no measure before Congress that I can support with more earnestness than this, and I desire to congratulate Mr. VOLSTEAD and his committee for having laid before Congress this splendid measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HADLEY). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I asked time in order to discuss generally the provisions of this bill, and in particular to reply to the references made yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] to the State of Maine. But because of the limitation of time and because of his absence from the Chamber I have no desire to proceed now, and I therefore ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, until to-day it had not been my purpose to say anything upon this measure. With its purpose I am in hearty accord, but there are provisions in it which I find it difficult to approve and the modification or elimination of which will make support of the bill much easier for me, but I expect to vote for it whether my views are fully met or not. The constitutional amendment gives to the Congress and the several States concurrent power to enforce its intent. If there is a technical difference between jurisdiction and power, as has been suggested in this debate, I believe the fair intendment of the Constitution is that the States and the Federal Government shall have concurrent jurisdiction and power. By our action we do not preclude any State from dealing with this subject. A State by legislation may not nullify any of the terms of this Federal statute, but it may supplement what we do here by the act of its legislature. Believing this, I should be content with less drastic legislation by Congress, for I should hope and expect each State to embody in its law such additional regulations and control, not inconsistent with congressional action, as its judgment and its public sentiment dictated.

But I have taken this opportunity to express my views on this subject primarily because I can not permit to pass unnoticed some of the references to my State made yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] and which were this morning called to my attention. Among other things, he said of Maine that there "drunkenness ran riot," and again "that prohibition in Maine has been a standing joke for years, and as a consequence the growth of Maine has been less than almost any section of the country." These statements and all the inferences to be drawn therefrom I emphatically deny.

In a few of our cities at certain times conditions have existed for which I shall offer neither excuse nor justification. None can be given. But these lapses in enforcement of the law have been only at intervals and the cities mentioned do not constitute the State of Maine, nor have conditions in them fairly reflected general conditions and public sentiment throughout our State. The citizenship of Maine stands to-day for prohibition and the enforcement of law. Our first law on this subject was enacted in 1846, and was reenacted in modified form in 1851. In 1884 the prohibitory amendment, so called, was added to our State constitution, and all through the years since, despite honest doubts on the part of some of our people as to the wisdom of constitutional prohibition, notwithstanding temporary periods of laxity in enforcement of our laws encouraged and in large degree brought about by corroding and corrupting influences from without our borders, a majority of our people have been steadfast in their faith, determined in their opposition to the liquor traffic and all that follows in its train.

The gentleman from Massachusetts alleges that he bases his statements upon observations extending over a period of 25 years. It is true that he has been much in the State and it is equally true and regrettable that, although in this length of years he has often spoken therein, his voice has never been heard in behalf of sobriety, of observance of the Sabbath, in behalf of law and constituted authority, but everywhere and always he has complained against and slandered the State and its people, and has preached the doctrine of nullification, and it has been in those periods when men holding his views were in temporary authority within limited areas that we have seen nullification of law rear its ugly head, the standards of public service, and the tone of public and private morals lowered. And every utterance of the gentleman from Massachusetts within the State has tended directly to these ends.

Let the figures which I now give and in the accuracy of which, I believe, answer the gentleman's charges and prove the inaccuracy of his observations:

Illiterates 10 years of age and over: Maine, 4.1 per cent; Massachusetts, 5.2 per cent.

Illiterate males of voting age: Maine, 5.5 per cent; Massachusetts, 6.1 per cent.

Families owning homes: Maine, 61.4 per cent; Massachusetts, 32.7 per cent.

Number paupers in almshouses per 100,000: Maine, 127.3; Massachusetts, 194.7.

Number insane in hospitals per 100,000: Maine, 169.5; Massachusetts, 344.6.

Number State prisoners per 100,000: Maine, 50.4; Massachusetts, 199.2.

Maine in 1915 ranked thirty-fourth in population among the States of the Union, but only 11 States exceeded our saving banks deposits and only 10 the number of our depositors. Maine makes no apologies for her record in these regards. It does not become a resident of Massachusetts to reflect upon her.

These are material considerations. But above all other issues raised by this and other bills of like import is one of principles, of morals. Men must align themselves with interests and a traffic which degrades, debauches, and demoralizes the individual and in the same manner affects the political unit, whether city, county, or State, or they must be affirmatively and positively against them. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made his choice, and the people of Maine have made their election. Maine came into the Union as the result of a compromise between right and wrong, but she stood then with right and with humanity, she has always so stood, and she is so allied to-day, with no thought of compromise in heart and mind.

And what contributions she has made to the thought and progress of her country! To literature she and her institutions have given a Longfellow, a Hawthorne, a Kellogg, an Abbott, and an Artemus Ward; to the law the passionate eloquence of a Prentiss, the logic of an Evans, the learning of a Greenleaf and a Fuller; and in this Hall there crowd upon my memory and I hear the voices of those sons of Maine who have played their potent part in the political life of the Nation. George Evans; William Pitt Fessenden, ranking in vision, in cogency of reasoning, and power of expression with the great leaders of his generation; Hannibal Hamlin, who, forsaking the political associates of a lifetime, took his place beside our martyred Lincoln for freedom and the preservation of the Union; our "plumed knight," James G. Blaine; Hale and Frye, for 40 years Members of this House and of the Senate of the United States; Thomas B. Reed; Nelson Dingley; Morrill; Boutelle; Milliken; Littlefield; and others have given to Maine a position in the legislative history of the country which commands the respect and admiration of all. And her unnamed sons and daughters may be found to-day throughout the great States of the central and far West, and they are there, like the men and women at home, a leavening and an uplifting influence, preaching and practicing the virtues of sobriety, of industry, of frugality and thrift, of respect for law and order, loving and striving to serve their country and their fellow men.

Mr. Chairman, what Maine has given to the country is recorded. Her fame is secure. Those of us now here may add little to it, but, Mr. Chairman, I love the State of Maine, her rocky coast, her hills, her forests, her lakes and streams, and, above all, her people, and the voice of malice and of slander can not assail them in my presence with impunity. I should count myself disloyal to my State and my people if I did not record my indignant protest whenever untruthful and unjust assaults are made upon them.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota yields 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because it goes to extremes and it is too drastic in effect. Drastic laws enacted against the wishes of the people create the spirit of intolerance, and intolerence breathes discontent and resentment.

The American working people have made a request upon this congressional body that light beers and wines be exempt from prohibition. They have spoken through the representatives of labor, and their request should be adhered to. The American Federation of Labor and other labor organizations in convention have gone on record against absolute prohibition. And the delegates to these conventions speak for the members they represent, comprising almost every craft of labor.

You can not silently ignore the wishes or demands of the great army of working people of our country. They do not wish the liberty of using light beers and wines to be taken from them. It has been customary for the workingman, after his day's toil, to take a glass of beer in his own home. He has always had this privilege, and has considered it his personal right to eat and drink as he pleased. A glass of light beer to the men in the mines, the mills, and the shops is a godsend. It is refreshing and stimulating after a hard day's work at the furnace or the machine. And these men, through organized labor, ask you to let them enjoy this privilege and have their refreshing beverage.

It is well to bear in mind this fact, that the workingmen and the sons of workingmen gallantly responded to their country's call in her hour of need, and they fought on foreign soil so that liberty might live. They labored with heart and hand, with brain and muscle, in the allied cause, and many of them made the supreme sacrifice with their lives. They kept the torch of liberty burning brightly, but now they see the attempt made to snatch from them a personal liberty they ask for and which they believe and know they are entitled to.

I am not a drinking man myself and do not advocate drinking, but because this is my way and my inclination I see no good ground to force on others against their wishes and against their will my mode of living in the matter of eating and drinking.

I was very much amused the other day, however, when a Member of Congress arose to speak on this question. He was not for prohibition, and his opening remarks showed it. Two gentlemen were sitting in back of me, and as my colleague started speaking one said to the other, "He is a booze hoister!" However, the Member in talking further made the statement that he was not for prohibition, but he submitted to the majority, and the same voice said, "He is a broad-minded man!" The congressional Member would have been branded as a booze hoister because he differed in opinion on this subject with the two men sitting in the rear of me. But as soon as he gave in to what they wanted he became a broad-minded man. The two men could not see the narrowness of their viewpoint when they could not discern or give credit for an honest difference of opinion entertained by another man.

I trust this bill will not pass this body, but that an amended bill may go through exempting light beers and wines, in accord with the desires and wishes of the great majority of the working people. Let Congress not put itself in the inconsistent position of having the best American youth cross the ocean to fight for liberty and then at home on American soil deprive them of the personal privilege and liberty they request.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE. No; I will not yield. I have only six minutes remaining. Now, in this connection I desire to call the attention of this body to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS], printed in the RECORD of yesterday, as follows:

> Who are the people, anyway, who are protesting against this legislation as being "drastic," "radical," and contrary to the principles of our Government? Who are the people that are writing us and sending us petitions and telegrams to vote against this bill? Would you say that the great moral forces of the Nation are arrayed against this legislation? What Member of this House has received resolutions passed by any church organization protesting against this bill? What educational or philanthropic society in America has taken a stand against it? How many wives, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts have written letters to Members of this House protesting against the passage of this bill? [Applause.] If any Member of this House has received any communication of this character, I would be glad to yield to him such time as may be necessary for him to make the fact known.

In answer to his query, "What educational or philanthropic society in America has taken a stand against it," for the benefit of the gentleman and this Congress I quote from a prominent Philadelphia newspaper which gives the attitude of the Law and Order Society of that city on the question, as follows:

WAR PROHIBITION UNFAIR, BUT LAW MUST BE OBEYED—SO SAYS GIBBONEY, CITING INSTANCES OF HOW PROHIBITION DOES NOT WORK FAIRLY—"PLENTY OF WORK AHEAD."

"With the passing of the saloon there will be plenty of work ahead for the Law and Order Society."

Thus spoke D. Clarence Gibboney, president of the Law and Order Society, in discussing the advent of war-time prohibition.

"The Law and Order Society expects to be busier than ever," he continued. "For there is every indication that the city will be full of speak-easies. We have only to take the experience of other cities, with their illicit distilleries, 'blind tigers,' and other illicit means of furnishing liquor.

"Take Maine, for instance. Although prohibition has been on the statute books there for some time, I am reliably informed by a Philadelphian who visited there with a party of friends that anybody could get all the liquor he wanted.

LIQUOR FOR "DRY" VOTES.

"A judge of one of our courts informed me that while passing the summer last year on an island in Maine he had occasion to go to town and was startled when seeing so many men on the street in an intoxicated condition. Upon asking why this was possible in a State where prohibition ruled, the judge was informed that they were holding an election again to determine whether prohibition should or should not continue, and that the liquor interests actually were giving a quart of liquor to every man who voted dry. The judge was informed that the liquor interests made more money selling liquor under prohibition rule and wanted it to continue, as they were not required to pay for licenses and other fees.

"The Law and Order Society will prosecute all violators of the liquor laws wherever complaints are made to us.

"I have no sympathy with war-time prohibition. I think it unfair. The dealers have paid the licenses and the Government tax. Yet the Government makes no provision for taking the goods off their hands. I have no sympathy for that kind of legislation, but law is law. Our society will cooperate with the authorities."

In answer to the further query of the gentleman, "What Member of this House has received resolutions passed by any church or organization protesting against this bill," I quote from a Philadelphia paper which gives the views of a prominent clergyman of that city on this question:

WORKERS' BEER DEFENDED BY REV. DR. CONWELL.

In the pulpit at the Baptist Temple for the last time before departing on his summer vacation, Dr. Conwell found inspiration for his sermon in Samuel Gompers's recent declaration that America had won a victory in the war, but had lost its liberty.

"As an American, I was startled by that announcement from the head of America's great labor organization," said Dr. Conwell, "when Mr. Gompers said 'we have won a victory but we have lost our liberty.' It would not agitate us so much if the utterance had been made by an ordinary man. But Gompers, I believe, is a man of unquestionable patriotism; of unquestionable integrity. When he makes a remark like that it means something.

"I think that Mr. Gompers's influence in America is equal to that of President Wilson in so far as America's future is concerned. The American workingmen if they wanted to combine could rule this country, and Gompers represents these workingmen."

With Gompers's strong antagonism to prohibition, Dr. Conwell expressed a radical difference of opinion. He said:

"Mr. Gompers is right, however, when he says that there is a fanatical disposition to go too far. There is a danger that the whole thing will be rescinded by our going to extremes in threatening to take away things that need not be dispensed with. The fanatics, the cranks, the men who would take away everything that is called beer, whether it is intoxicating or not, give the workingman the impression that he is being persecuted. Let us be fair, rational Americans to the laboring man. The cry that 'you have lost your liberty' is the most dangerous cry that could go out to the workingman.

"Men should be allowed to express their opinion with the utmost freedom under the American flag. I say that not merely as my own opinion, but in the belief that it is the gospel of God. The public press should be allowed the greatest freedom that is consistent with truth and fidelity to patriotism. Prewar liberty must not be succeeded by afterwar oppression."

I want to say in conclusion that I fully believe if this Congress at this time meets the request of the workingmen you have settled the liquor question for years to come; if not, you will find it in every campaign until their demands have been granted. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Sixty-sixth Congress, I shall not take up your time by going into the percentage of alcohol that beer might or should contain in order that American citizens be permitted to drink it. I just want to say to you that some years ago out in the State of Illinois the legislature was busy passing a bill that declared the Desplaines River to be a navigable stream. Now, that legislature could have legislated from the 1st day of January until the last day of the session, and if there was no water in the Desplaines River it would not have been navigable, in spite of the law.

We passed a law here providing that when it was 12 o'clock meridian it should be 1 o'clock. I had occasion to look at a sundial over in the State of Indiana, and the foolish sun did not know we had passed that law. The sundial indicated that it was 12 o'clock when it was 12 o'clock in spite of the law. What I wish to convey is that what is intoxicating is a question of fact, and if a drink does not intoxicate you can not make it do so by law.

But there is something in this bill which convinces me that a great many men who have spoken upon this floor have not read this bill, or if they have read it they have not analyzed it. This bill (H. R. 6810) is chiefly a bill to give effect and to enforce the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and to provide for the enforcement of war prohibition; and I maintain that no gentleman is transgressing the Constitution of the United States as amended by participating in the debate here, by offering amendments, and by trying to make this law a reasonable working law. I maintain that it is not alone our right but that it is our duty to do so.

Now, I take it for granted that every Member of this Congress has the desire to be fair with all men who might innocently suffer by virtue of the provisions of this act, and I am going to call your attention now to a couple of its provisions. On page 3 it is provided that—

If a person has knowledge or reason to believe that his property is occupied or used in violation of the provisions of the war-prohibition act and suffers the same to be so used, such property shall be subject to a lien for and may be sold to pay all fines and costs assessed against the occupant of such building or property for any violation of the war-prohibition act, which said lien shall attach from the time of the service of summons on the owner or his agent; and any such lien may be established and enforced by legal action instituted for that purpose in any court having jurisdiction.

The interpretation of this part of section 3 can only mean that if a person not guilty, but who is accused of having knowledge that his property is occupied or used in violation of the provisions of the war-prohibition act, then the mere starting of legal proceedings against him ties up his property and renders a sale or a transfer of the same impossible, no matter how slight the offense and no matter how many tenants there may be inhabiting such property.

With the crowded condition of the courts that might mean years and irreparable loss to one man for an offense committed by another man, and before you gentlemen leap into action on this bill it might as well be considered.

Section 4, page 4, starting in line 8, provides:

Where a temporary injunction is prayed for, the court may issue an order restraining the defendants and all other persons from removing or in any way interfering with the liquor or fixtures, or other things used in connection with such alleged illegal sale of such liquor. No bond shall be required as a condition for making any order or issuing any writ of injunction under this act.

In other words, an irresponsible accuser, who possibly does not own a dollar, can go into court and make the accusation without bond upon which action is based, and if you will look at page 4, line 23, you will find that—

If the owner appears and pays all costs of the proceedings and files a bond, with sureties to be approved by the clerk of the court in which the action is brought, in the full value of the property, conditioned that he will immediately abate said nuisance.

And so forth.

Now, here you have the situation that the possible irresponsible accuser, who may be interested in making the accusation on the ground of personal or political hostility, can go into court and secure a writ of injunction against the property owner without a bond, and that the responsible property owner who is being accused has got to file a bond.

Think of it, gentlemen. Here is a man who is disgruntled about something, and he can go in and tie up a hundred thousand dollars' worth of property by accusing some man of having something illegal going on. The accuser has not got to file any bond, but the owner has got to file a bond, and while the irresponsible man has to file no bond, he can get on the next train and leave, while the property owner has got to stay because his property is tied up.

Under the provisions of this bill, from line 2 to line 6, inclusive, on page 6—

Any person found guilty of contempt under the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment of not less than 30 days nor more than 12 months, or by both fine and imprisonment.

Found guilty of what? Found guilty, for instance, of having a tenant on his property who is occupying or using said property in violation of the war prohibition act.

Gentlemen, you are passing a bill tying up innocent men's property. If any of you own property and have tenants, and one of them misbehaves, your property is held for the fine that may be imposed for that man's offense, an offense of which you did not know anything and could not know anything. That is in the bill. If you do not think it is in the bill, read it, and if you vote for it without reading it you are not giving the people of the United States the fair deal that they deserve at your hands.

What I am trying to have you see is that the provisions of the law are so drastic that they do not alone seek to reach out and punish actual offenders, but they also reach out and punish the owners of houses and lessees of rooms where an offense under this law might be committed.

By the way, the mere accusation against the owner of the property is not removed by his going in and filing a bond. There must be a final adjudication to release the property, and you know what that means in a suit in law or bill in equity in cities like the one in which I live, where cases are sometimes 20 and 24 months back on the calendar. The innocent man who has committed no offense is tied hand and foot. If a mortgage expires or a trust deed expires during that period of time, there is no bank that would loan him a dollar on the property with a bill in equity filed against it. He could not get a dollar and you know it.

Now, is that what you mean to do to men who have not offended? I suppose that by my standing here and talking to you some of you may gain the idea that I am a man who wants lots of whisky and beer and everything connected with it.

I want to say to you that I have not yet smoked my first cigar, and I do not know the cards in a deck, and I maintain that I am just as clean morally and physically as any of you. This legislation, if you pass it the way you have written it, is unjust, and every thinking man that has some regard for the other fellow will say so. You are imposing a hardship upon thousands of well-meaning citizens, as good citizens as we have in the country, who do not want it.

On page 5 of this bill you will find that the owner of property is dragged into court by an accuser who does not have to furnish a bond to obtain an injunction. You will find, I say, that such owner shall file a bond with sureties in the full value of the property. And I want to ask you Members of Congress, many of whom no doubt have read Article VIII of the United States Constitution, what is going to become of this article? I want to remind you of its language. This is what it says:

> Excessive bail shall not be required nor excessive fines imposed nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

Throughout this bill you have tried to steer clear of and avoid trial by jury and provide for trial by injunction. I hope I am not offending the tender sensibilities of any gentleman by quoting Article VI of the Constitution of the United States. Every now and then we seem to forget that this document is still the supreme law of the land. When I listen to the reading of this bill by the Clerk, Article VI of our Constitution becomes quaint, old-fashioned reading to me. Does it not to you? This is how it reads:

> In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

I listened yesterday to the wonderful speech made by my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]——

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. REBER. The gentleman is looking intently at me all the time, and I want to say to him that I am on his side of the question. I wish he would look at the other fellows and convince them. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUUL. Then I shall have to look at the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL]. He will not mind. I can always talk better when I am looking at somebody.

Mr. RANDALL of California. The gentleman is making a very good speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JUUL. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. IGOE. All of the time has been allotted.

Mr. JUUL. Oh, give me three or four minutes.

Mr. IGOE. I can give the gentleman one minute.

Mr. JUUL. Oh, give me three.

Mr. IGOE. I am sorry I have not got it.

Mr. JUUL. Will somebody else do it? Will the gentleman from Minnesota give me three?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not the time.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield the gentleman all of my time.

Mr. JUUL. I have appealed here to gentlemen on the other side for 10 minutes, and I could not get it. I will tell you one other thing in the one minute that I have left. On page 7, on lines 23, 24, and 25, the Congress has absolutely delegated its powers in the following language:

> The term "permit" means a formal written authorization by the commissioner setting forth specifically the things that are mentioned.

You are giving the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I suppose it is, absolute carte blanche to go ahead and name the things that are permitted, a duty which you should perform as Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

I followed the speech of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] yesterday. He stood here and read a list of thousands and thousands of men who had voted for prohibition and lesser thousands of other men who had voted against it. Are these other thousands entitled to nothing better than you are offering them in this bill, though they be men who have no intention of committing a violation of any of the laws of the United States, men who are guilty only of having accumulated a bit of property? Are they to be hauled in on injunctions and to have their property tied up for weeks and months and to furnish bonds to defend themselves? [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, times change and men change with them. Thirty years ago in a public speech in Texas, in the discussion of the question of State prohibition, I made the prediction that the time would come when an effort would be made to secure national prohibition, and I was laughed to scorn for making that statement by the most strenuous prohibitionists in the audience. The position then taken by even ardent prohibitionists was that it was a question of local interest and concern and of State police regulation, and that no one would ever be willing to confer the powers necessary to enforce prohibition upon the Federal Government.

I have lived to see the day of the rising tide, and I am frank to say that the American people, considering the great evils of drunkenness and intemperance, have with the increasing agitation grown more and more in favor of any measure, regardless of any question of local self-government, that would enforce the total destruction of the business of manufacturing or dealing in intoxicating liquors. Let me say further that five years ago a portion of this bill would not have received the votes of 20 Members of this House as it was then constituted. The portion to which I refer is that part that proposes to pass statutory prohibition in time of peace for the whole United States, and before the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, which alone gives Congress the power to pass prohibition laws, shall take effect. I know that the first part of this proposed bill does not profess to pass a statutory prohibition law in time of peace, but it seeks to evade the question of lack of power by professing to amend a law that was passed in time of war. If the amendment is an essential part it is a new law, and if the definition of intoxicating liquor contained in this bill amends the war-time prohibition law so as to give it a different effect, then we may just as well institute and pass a new law at this time in time of peace to enforce prohibition over the whole United States.

From my childhood up I have felt that that was a question with which the Federal Government, except as a war measure, had nothing to do, and every Member of this House believes that I was right in that conviction. What, then, are we to say when we come to this bill, with its new definition, its new and additional penalties in a time of actual peace, as to whether the war is ended or not technically?

This bill, professing to amend the war-time prohibition act, has for its object other purposes than those named in the war-time prohibition act, for they were purposes only of maintaining our Army—what are we to say when we come to this bill, which, in effect, imposes statutory prohibition by the Federal Government in time of peace? I say that, so far as the first title of this bill is concerned, it is statutory prohibition proposed in time of peace, and I do not believe a Member of this House thinks that it comes within the purview of the powers granted in the Constitution or that it is not included in the powers reserved by the Constitution to the States.

Having said that much, I am satisfied to state that with my belief in respect to the powers granted in the Constitution to the Federal Government and the powers reserved to the States I shall be compelled to vote against this bill as long as Title I is as it is; and while I would represent my people, and would bow to their behest and propose to do it, I could not vote for an unconstitutional measure, such as Title I of this bill is, if every man, woman, and child in my district urged me to do it, because with my conviction, with my belief that it is violative of the grants of the Constitution and violative of those powers which by the Constitution were reserved to the States, if I voted for it I would vote for it in violation of my oath of office and my obligation to support the Constitution.

I want to say a little something about the constitutional amendment. I really take no stock in the question or discussion of what "concurrent" is. My judgment is that it was put in that form for this reason: If it had not been placed in that form I am inclined to think it could have been successfully contended that by that constitutional amendment all of the powers of the States to deal with the liquor problem had been taken away and conferred upon the United States alone. I think that the prohibition advocates of the amendment were in favor of using that word lest they destroy the powers of the State entirely. In my judgment both the States and Federal Government have the power now to adopt prohibitory legislation, but even the States must adopt laws that conform to the constitutional amendment. Otherwise their laws may perhaps be held unconstitutional and in contravention of the eighteenth amendment. The question of the definition of alcoholic or intoxicating liquor does not trouble me, and for this reason: If this definition be without authority it will have no effect, and the courts will construe it as being null and void and will say that it is a question of fact in the trial of each case when a party is charged with violating the law as to whether the drink was intoxicating liquor. I am inclined to think that the courts will so hold. I am inclined to think that the legislatures can not define a term used in the Constitution so as to alter the real meaning of the term; but that makes no difference. Therefore, the questions with reference to concurrency of jurisdiction or with reference to the quantitative percentage would not have anything to do with my vote. I am free to say that there are terms in Titles II and III that seem to be unduly hard, perhaps violative of every principle I have ever loved of personal liberty. I do not know about that, but I am free to say that I can not vote for this measure so long as it contains a feature which would make me in my belief guilty of violation of my oath of office if I voted for it. Let me say now that when the eighteenth amendment becomes a part of the Constitution I shall feel bound on my oath of office to vote for any law that may be required to honestly, faithfully, and fully enforce it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, several reasons have been given for making this bill so drastic. I believe that if the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota or the committee had themselves drawn the bill they would not have made it so drastic. It has been charged on the floor of this House that neither that gentleman nor any member of the committee had anything to do with the drawing of the bill. That has not been denied, so we may accept the charge as true.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just for a brief statement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not for a statement; for a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I just wanted to explain——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman can explain in his own time; I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. All right; go on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I notice that the gentleman is not very generous in extending time to opponents of his measure. I noticed that the gentleman at the time when I was making a very important statement the other day would not even give me 10 minutes in which to finish. I do not know whether that is because Carranza is an ally of the Anti-Saloon League, but I know the chairman would not give me time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this bill was purposely so drawn because it is not the intention of the organizations guiding our committee to have this law properly enforced. With the exception of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, whose sincerity I do not doubt, all the rest of the organizations do not desire to go out of existence now. They have too much of a good thing, and want it to last as long as possible.

There is not a supporter of this bill who has satisfactorily explained how they are going to deal with moonshine whisky. Why, they seem to gloat over the fact that whisky will be clandestinely manufactured and be sold. They seem to rejoice that cities will come down to their dry districts and buy it. It has not been denied that when we have nation-wide prohibition that people will resort to drinking strong liquor, whisky, flavoring extracts, when they can not obtain light wines and beers.

Mr. JUUL. And kerosene.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And they seem to be proud of the fact. A great deal has been said about the foreign element. Now, let me tell you that the foreign element in this country are not consumers of whiskies and liquors. Some of them drink light wines and beers, but the greater majority of our working foreign element in this country have all they can do to buy proper clothing, shoes, and food for their families. They have nothing left with which to buy booze and strong drink. [Applause.]

Of course I am not able to say how much alcohol it takes to get one intoxicated, or the terrible results of the excessive use of that article. I have not had any of that in my family, or anybody with whom I associate, so I do not know. I know that in my district of about 250,000 inhabitants, right in the heart of New York City, you do not see any excess drinking from all of this so-called foreign element. In my humble judgment it is dangerous to establish a precedent in construing a statute to the extent that is attempted in this bill. If we start in construing a law, as we do here, why, when the tariff bill will be before us we will have to construe the difference between a sardine and anchovy and every article on the tariff. Gentlemen say that the majority of the people of this country are in favor of this bill, and yet a careful reading of this bill will show that they are not ready to trust a jury composed of the average American citizen to pass upon matters of fact.

Everywhere possible an equity action is provided. Temporary injunction without the necessity of giving a bond can be obtained. A man owns a hotel on this side of the street controlled by a drug store or the coca-cola crowd can go and enjoin a man on the other side of the street on his mere say so, shut up his opponents business for weeks at a time, perhaps right in the season, and afterwards on final hearing, if it is found that there was insufficient facts to sustain the injunction, the writ is dismissed and in the meantime the man's business is ruined. There is no redress, as this law specifically does away with the requirement of a bond. All through this bill we get away from a trial by jury. Equity courts are here called on to try matters of a criminal nature and to mete out punishment. I ask the distinguished chairman why is it that he does not resort to the usual and customary procedure in criminal action, an indictment by a grand jury and trial by a petit jury. Is even the right of trial by jury to be taken away? And still the gentleman says in every community the American people are in favor of this drastic measure. There was no time in the history of our country where we must be so careful in the proper enforcement of our laws. I disagree with some who say that if this law is enforced that we will have trouble because of its enforcement. I maintain that this law will be almost impossible of enforcement, and if this law fails to be enforced, as it certainly will be as it is drawn, it will create contempt and disregard for law all over this country. That is what the radical element is seeking to do now, showing that all people have not an equal protection of the law, showing that there exists a favored class. Why it is possible under this law to accumulate a large amount of liquor and use it. It is possible for a man who can afford it to take a trip to Cuba and elsewhere and drink to his heart's content. If all States do not pass like enforcement laws and we have various methods of enforcement, if this measure is loosely enforced after we have adopted the eighteenth amendment, it means simply fuel to the radical element to create a disregard for and disobedience to our laws. And this measure now is humanly impossible of being enforced. Why, gentlemen talk about conditions in New York City. You take into consideration the population of New York City, and I am willing to compare the criminal record of New York City, with its 6,000,000 inhabitants, in proportion to population with any dry district in the United States. [Applause.]

You will find for the average of our population we have less crime than you have in your dry districts. Now, I do not say that excess drinking of whisky is good. I do not know anything about it, as I told you, none of my ancestors had that failing. I traced it way back and the only one of my ancestors I could find who drank to excess was a certain Nero, and he got the habit from his mother who was born on the Rhine. [Laughter and applause.]

Is there really an honest desire to carry out the intention of the eighteenth amendment? You do not do it by this bill, and I charge that you do not want to do it. You want to keep up your lecture tours; you want to exploit the drunks. I want to reform them. It has been profitable, it is a great thing for you, and you want to keep it up.

The law is being obeyed in New York City to-day, with its vast population, better than in any other section in the United States, even in the dry States. The hotels have absolutely shut down on serving beverages containing alcohol. The saloons are not serving anything but light beer, I understand, and yet the traffic in bad whisky coming from the dry States is increasing, and men who never drank whisky before will now buy the small, flat flask that can be easily passed and concealed, and pay high prices for it and be poisoned.

Now, this is what you are doing here: You are absolutely stimulating and increasing the use of bad, bad alcohol. If that is your intention, you are going to succeed with this measure. Temperance or prohibition is a matter of education and not of legislation. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union have been doing good work for many years along educational lines. There is less whisky consumed to-day than there was 10, 15, or 20 years ago. By proper education, by proper training, if you really have the interest and the welfare of this country at heart, you can train the people so that the next generation will not use alcohol and will not require any law of this kind. But I say that with this measure as it is drawn here we will not do that, but we will do exactly the contrary. We will create a lot of whisky drinking all through the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, there is one point in this bill which strikes me as perfectly outrageous, and that is the provision as to the search of dwellings. It says:

No search warrant shall issue to search any private dwelling occupied as such unless it is in part used for some business purpose such as a store, shop, saloon, restaurant, hotel, or boarding house.

It seems to me to show the entire object for which this bill is to be passed. Take my district, for instance; the more expensive apartments and private houses have not any stores under them, including Mr. Rockefeller's house—a gentleman who is paying for this thing. That has not any store under it. And the same is true of the big apartment houses. They have not shops under them. But I presume 90 per cent of the people living in the cities do live in houses that have stores under them. And those people can be searched. This is a law which is openly and frankly made to apply to the poor and not to the rich. It is a law which is being made to affect the poor, who can not store any wine. Any man who is rich enough to own a house, who is rich enough to live in a good apartment, will be able to stock up to his heart's content. He can keep it and he can get it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PELL. For one question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman vote for an amendment making it possible to have a search warrant issued against a dwelling house regardless of its connection with any other business?

Mr. PELL. I will vote for no amendment for the entrance of any private residence or any American's house for such a purpose no matter whose—urban or rural, rich or poor.

This law is beneficial to the rich. They can get on. The big industries, perhaps, can get a benefit by having less drinking among their men. But the employer, the manager, is able to get all that he pleases.

Now, I can assure you, gentlemen, that in New York this argument is being used for the most sinister purpose. I myself have heard it in open street meetings. I heard this when the Anti-Saloon League brought this law up in the Legislature of New York. This provision was attacked there; and it seems to me, whatever the merits of prohibition are—and I am far from saying I do not see a great deal of good in it—it seems to me most unwise at the present moment for us to pass a law which will add materially to the distinction between the rich and the poor. There is going to be enough of that feeling in any case, and it is most unwise for us at this time to add to it, and also it is most unwise for this House to pass a law which undoubtedly in the great cities will be received with contempt. There is enough contempt of law and enough class feeling already, without adding to it by the passage of such a law.

You can say, indeed, that in the long run the private stock will not affect the issue; that it will be consumed fairly rapidly in three or four or five years; but it is in the next three or four or five years that we will face a very serious social danger. As you know, there are sitting in this House to-day four Members from New York City—two of them Republicans and two of them Democrats—on whom the major parties agreed in order to beat the Socialists. Now, if you pass this law and you allow it to say that every rich man in the country can do as he pleases and every poor man shall have his residence searched you will find not 4 but 10 such Members coming from the city of New York and many others from other parts of the country. You will be giving these anarchists a tremendous handle, and it seems to me that the distant benefits of national prohibition will be dearly bought at the cost of serious social trouble. There is no use dodging the issue. Bolshevism is a serious danger, and we should do nothing at the present time to further class feeling, discontent, and contempt of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNELL] half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, the House having under consideration the so-called prohibition-enforcement act, I desire to take advantage of the opportunity afforded me by my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] to attempt in the very short time allowed me a brief statement of my position in respect to this intended law. I have the honor of representing in this body a great district, an aggregation of law-abiding and self-respecting people. Nearly all the nations of the earth have contributed a quota, some more, some less, to this population. I am here as the chosen representative in this House of a section of Brooklyn and Queens Boroughs in the Empire State of New York, where, on last election day, nearly 65,000 votes were cast. If you consider that there are so great a number of voters in the ninth district of New York, is it not reasonable to suppose that fully 300,000 or more people live within its boundaries? There are few, if any, Members of the Congress that have a constituency in excess of that number. The greater the number of people we are here to represent the greater should be the caution and the care with which we should seek to reflect their views when called upon to vote upon a question such as this that seeks to abrogate their rights and their liberties. I agree, sir, with the statements of many of my colleagues when they make the solemn declaration that the drastic and utterly un-American features of this bill, if enacted, will increase the unrest among our people and leave an open cancer in the body politic into which the Bolshevist and Socialist microbe will crawl, find lodgment, and fructify to the danger, yea, the menace of our Government and its safety.

Great lawyers whose standing at the courts of their several States are generally recognized have contended that no instrument yet offered in the history of the Congress of the United States or any separate State thereof has ever attempted any law the equal of the one we have now under consideration. These lawyers are Members of this House. Their legal acumen is a matter of common knowledge and candidly admitted alike by friend and foe of this measure. Then, on the other hand, we have equally eminent jurist Members of this body who support this bill in its entirety. If such legal talent are at odds in the process of making the law, what are we to expect when questions of fact are submitted to the courts of the various States as to what is and is not intoxicating liquor by volume. In the last analysis the courts of the land, and not the Congress, will have to decide this determining factor. Section 3, on page 8, of the bill uses this language:

That no person shall manufacture, sell, barter, give away, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, receive, or possess any intoxicating liquor.

And so forth.

Here we have a proposition abrogating the right of a man or woman to exercise the function of hospitality in their own home. Is there any land on earth that would tolerate such drastic and mandatory legislation? I am not here as an advocate of, nor do I hold a brief for, the manufacturer of hard liquor so called. On the contrary, I am advocating the right of the man who toils and the good woman who as his wife and helpmate presides over his little home and family to have, keep, furnish, possess, and enjoy a glass of beer and light wine whenever he pleases.

The many people in my district from whom I have heard orally and by mail would be satisfied and contented with this concession. Then again section 7, on page 13, says:

A physician duly licensed shall issue prescriptions for liquor.

Hence the proponents of the bill are on record that this great evil has some good features. I suppose it is a case of "whisky when I'm sick makes me well," and so forth, with them. I agree with many of my colleagues that this law if enacted will be a political question for years to come. This Congress limits the alcohol in a drinking beverage to one-half of 1 per cent. The next may raise it to 5 per cent, the following to 10 per cent, and so on until the end of time. Each succeeding Congress has the right to enact an enforcement law, and it will according to its wet or dry tendencies. Why the haste in this enactment? Why not give the men whose money is invested in this business a chance to adjust their affairs and wait until the prohibition amendment goes into effect in January next? It is a serious question with them. They should be given an opportunity to get into other enterprises to earn a livelihood. They, too, are Americans, their business was licensed, both by the State and Federal Governments, and they are entitled to this consideration. Gentlemen of the Congress, in conclusion I make a plea for the retention of light wines and beer, and in doing so I cherish the firm conviction that I am reflecting the opinion of a great majority of the electorate of the district whose representative I have the distinguished honor to be and whose interest I hope always to be able to serve while a Member of the House.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANLY].

Mr. GANLY. Mr. Chairman, owing to the fact that all the time is taken up on this bill I will make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GANLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, owing to the fact that the time allotted to those opposed to this measure has already been given out, I will have to content myself with the few brief moments allotted to me to take up but a few of the most important phases of this bill.

I believe that this bill is an unjust bill, because it discriminates between the rich and the poor; it gives the right to the man who owns his own private dwelling to have any supply of beer or wines that he might see fit to have, but the man who is living in a dwelling house or in a house where a store or such is a part is deprived of that right; also the fact that one year ago when this bill was passed in this House it was expressly understood that the people who were then engaged in the liquor business were to be given one year of time in which to close up their business. Another hardship that is imposed upon these men is that in a number of cases they have had leases on stores for from 5 to 10 years. I know of one case myself where a man has a lease on a store for 10 years with 2 years yet to run. What is this man to do with this store after this prohibition question goes into existence? This to my mind is a great injustice to this man. He is absolutely liable for the rent of this store, inasmuch as he has leased it for a certain length of time. And yet he is not in a position to occupy it for the purpose for which it was leased.

The great State of New York, from which I come here as a Member, expressed its feeling toward prohibition in unmistakable words when at the last election it reversed a large Republican majority in that State and elected as its governor Alfred E. Smith, then opposed by Charles Whitman. Mr. Whitman was the supposed leader of the "dry" forces of the State, and he was the only one on the Republican ticket who was soundly and severely beaten. This, I believe, was an indication on the part of the people of that State as to what they thought of prohibition.

There are numerous other legal questions which I believe it will be up to the United States Supreme Court to decide. I want to say, in conclusion, that in one part of my congressional district when the election was held the city of Mount Vernon and the people of that section voted 3 to 1 in favor of "wet." I certainly hope that this bill will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in our Declaration of Independence we begin by saying that men have inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We then went on and fought a war, and I have never heard that there was any prohibition in the Revolutionary War—but we were remarkably successful—nor in any other war that we have carried on. I believe the boys had some drink over in France in this past war, and it did not hurt them any.

George Washington and his colleagues as the founders of this Nation did not insert in the Constitution any prohibition article. Yet the Constitution of the United States is said to be the wisest charter ever issued or worked out by mortal man.

I can look back over 60 years myself very clearly, and during those 60 years the population of this country has more than doubled. The poor and the oppressed of all nations have come over here for happiness, wealth, health, and everything that human beings enjoy, and they found them here. They did not care to go back, so that we have had a great and glorious Nation here for many, many years. In that time we have developed in every way. Electricity amounted to little or nothing in my early days. Steam was only fairly started. We were not then a great Nation such as we are now. I think when I first remember the population of this country was less than fifty millions, somewhere around forty millions. So that, as I say, we have had a glorious country, going forward in everything, and one of the lessons and one of the ideas of this country during my time has been that "that country is the best governed that governs the least." Sumptuary laws, laws that are unnecessary, laws that are twisted up for the purpose, seemingly, of giving lawyers employment to disentangle them—and that is what this bill looks like—are unwise laws. Even great lawyers, such as yesterday held this floor, were unable to agree as to the effect and meaning of certain provisions of this bill. If that is true, it seems to me we are about to pass a law the meaning of which we shall not know after we shall have passed it.

Now, I believe in temperance, but temperance is a very different thing from total abstinence or prohibition. When you talk about the miseries and troubles of this country, they are very light, I think, compared with those of other nations. In all my long years it seems to me I have dwelt among a very happy and prosperous people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, a little actual experience is worth a week of argument. For that reason I will ask that the Clerk read in my time a news item from the Los Angeles Examiner relating to the experience of the beach resort of Venice under the present prohibition law.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

VENICE GAINS FROM DRY LAW—FOURTH OF JULY CROWDS MOST ORDERLY AND GENEROUS CITY EVER ENTERTAINED.

Residents of Venice, who feared the city would lose its popularity when the sale of liquor was prohibited, are more cheerful since the Fourth of July. They now declare that not only was patronage increased but the patrons were those who did the city more good from a financial standpoint.

Notwithstanding the enormous crowd on the Fourth, it was the first time in the history of the city that it was not necessary to increase the number of policemen. Most of the policemen on duty were on traffic. Venice never before had as many automobiles parked within its limits. There was no ban on fireworks or firecrackers. There was not one arrest for drunkenness. There was not one reported loss of money or valuables. There was not one injured by explosives or by automobiles. There was not one accident to automobiles. There was no one drowned and no near drownings reported. This is a record that Venice never made before on a Fourth of July.

[Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of California. Now, for the information of the Members of the House, and particularly for the edification of the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. IGOE], I ask the Clerk to read an item from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the item referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CRIME FALLS OFF FIRST DRY WEEK—POLICE REPORTS SHOW DIMINISHING VIOLENCE FOR FIRST SEVEN DAYS OF WAR-TIME PROHIBITION.

The first week of war-time prohibition in St. Louis, which ended last night, has shown a marked decrease in crimes and in the number of arrests.

During the week but one serious instance of bloodshed occurred. This was the case of Peter Birmingham, who was shot and killed by a policeman whom a number of youths had attacked.

With this exception, the police records show only a few minor hold-ups and burglaries. Last night no robbery in the streets was reported, and only a few small thefts in buildings.

The average nightly number of arrests in central police district, the downtown section, which includes Market Street, is now about 4. It was formerly 20 or more.

Acting Chief of Police Gillaspy said to a Post-Dispatch reporter who inquired as to the record of the first dry week:

"It was one of the quietest weeks that the police force had known in many years. Of course, in police work one never knows what is going to happen, but it seems reasonable that, with the cause of much crime eliminated, the results will be lessened."

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, national prohibition does not purport to be a panacea for all our ills. However, I am in favor of national prohibition and for its strict enforcement. The ancient wet argument has been made from this floor that prohibition does not prohibit, and that crime in the District of Columbia and other places has increased since the prohibition law went into effect.

We who have lived in wet territory that later became dry know that such arguments will not stand the searchlight of official investigation. We know from abundant observation that every wet argument along this line falls to the ground wherever prohibition has been honestly tried. We know that in my own State of Washington and our neighbor States of Oregon and Idaho and other dry States that the benefits of prohibition are in direct relation to the enforcement of the dry law, and that from the very nature of things stringent enforcement laws are necessary.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that none are so well able to speak on this absorbing topic as the officials who have lived for years in their respective States before the sale of alcoholic liquors was prohibited and who have occupied high official positions before or since these States went dry.

I call to witness Gov. Thomas E. Kilby, of Alabama, who says:

My State went dry January 1, 1915. Prohibition is an unqualified success in Alabama. Drunkenness is reduced to a minimum, crime reduced 50 per cent, and there is a large increase in bank deposits. The new city jail at Birmingham has been empty over a year, and many county jails are without prisoners. The business sentiment of Alabama strongly indorses present prohibition conditions regardless of former attitude on the subject.

I call to witness the late Gov. Ernest Lister of my State of Washington, who after three years' observation testifies:

There has been a marked improvement in conditions. Even in the larger cities, such as Seattle, Spokane, and Tacoma the sentiment for prohibition is much stronger to-day than ever before.

I call Thomas E. Campbell, governor of Arizona, who says:

My State went dry January 1, 1915. Prohibition has resulted in a marked decrease in commitments to penal institutions and the hospitals for the insane. The number of destitute families has greatly decreased. The best possible indorsement is that the voters, after two years' trial, overwhelmingly adopted a more stringent prohibition bill.

Again, I call Gov. Charles H. Brough, of Arkansas, who testifies:

My State went dry January 1, 1916. Conditions are greatly improved since State-wide prohibition went into effect. Crimes have materially decreased. Gen. Leonard Wood stated to me that the principal reason Little Rock secured the Camp Pike cantonment was because of prohibition.

Next I call to witness the governor of Colorado, Oliver H. Shoup, who says:

Colorado went dry January 1, 1916. Colorado has shown a marked advance in many lines. It is safe to say that the State will never revert to the old policy of licensing the liquor traffic.

Again, I call to witness Gov. Davis, of Idaho, who says:

My State went dry January 1, 1916. There is no question of the benefit of prohibition. Countless thousands of our citizens have been benefited directly or indirectly by the elimination of the liquor traffic. We have some cases of illicit selling, but these can not begin to dim the shining light of the new era.

Listen to this testimony of Gov. Allen, of Kansas:

This State has been in the prohibition column since 1881. Prohibition has contributed much to our material welfare. Money that was formerly spent in the support of the liquor traffic is now gone into better food and those things which mean better social conditions; but great as has been the material advance it is on the moral side that Kansas has gained most. Crime has decreased, jails in many counties have been entirely empty for a long period, and pauperism has decreased. The sentiment in Kansas is to-day practically unanimous in its support.

The testimony of Gov. Albert E. Sleeper, of Michigan, declares that after one year arrests for drunkenness all over the State have been cut down to about one-quarter. Business men report that bills are paid more promptly, and the effect of prohibition on general business has been good.

And, again, the governor of Mississippi says after 10 years' observation:

Prohibition has brought a very marked decrease in crime and a marked increase in material prosperity. Our people are delighted with the results.

The governor of Nebraska testifies that—

There is no doubt that if prohibition was to be resubmitted to the people they would give it a much larger affirmative vote than it received when it was first adopted.

Will the gentleman who would return to the old régime listen to the Governor of New Hampshire when he testifies:

Conditions have been so much better under prohibition than under license that many former believers in license are now outspoken for prohibition. We confidently expect even better results after July 1. The comparative arrests for drunkenness in our eight largest cities which were formerly license are:

May, 1917, to March, 1918, under license	6,987
May, 1918, to March, 1919, under prohibition	1,547

And will the gentleman from Massachusetts, who produced the damp argument, hear the testimony of the Governor of North Carolina:

After 10 years of observation crime is unquestionably less. If we should have a vote on the question to-day, the majority for prohibition would be larger than when it was first voted. Prohibition has the effect of saving money to those who would drink, and general efficiency as well as individual efficiency is enhanced.

Many other governors desire to testify, but time forbids. However, in 28 States where prohibition has been operative from 1 year to 40 years only one governor gives a verdict against prohibition, 1 has not answered, and 26 governors of dry States testify that social and business conditions have been improved and that crime has been reduced 25 to 75 per cent.

Detroit, Washington, Seattle, Indianapolis, Portland, Oregon, Denver, Atlanta, San Antonio, Birmingham, and Omaha are the 10 largest cities in the United States that have been dry more than six months. Their populations vary from 200,000 to 850,000 each. Their mayors and chiefs of police, with a single exception, testify very much as does the chief of police of Portland, Oreg., who says:

Prohibition has been a success. Hundreds of representative citizens who voted against it are now ardent supporters. Buildings formerly occupied by saloons were rented with very little delay. A few months preceding the adoption of prohibition I handled some 1,600 cases of destitution, and in practically every case the head of the family owed a saloon bill. Ten months after the adoption of prohibition I checked 75 corner grocery stores in the district where most of this destitution was, and without a single exception collections from 50 to 75 per cent better were reported. The year preceding prohibition our average daily arrests for drunkenness were 23; the year following the average per day was 2½.

And so must every chief of police of every city in the land testify, because criminologists tell us that alcohol is a contributory cause of 85 per cent of all crime, and I challenge any man to prove to the contrary.

The drinking of alcoholic liquors, poverty, and crime go hand in hand, and to the degree to which we suppress the one we eliminate the others, and while we would not interfere with any legitimate industry, business, or profession, this law must necessarily have teeth.

The same total prohibition that was necessary during war to bring our soldiers to their highest efficiency is equally necessary during the final months of demobilization and during reconstruction. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall be able to say nothing that will influence the vote of any Member of this body, nor will I be able to make my own position plainer with my own people; but, as this great question comes to a final issue in this great body, I want my voice to go with my vote. I shall support this bill.

The fact that it contains some provisions that I would not have put into it will not deter me from voting for it. We do not get things just as we want them; we have to take them in the best shape that we can get them. The American people have found that the men who have engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor have made their business the mainstay and support of practically all of the evil influences that curse American life. They have made it a corrupting influence in politics and in the courts. It has impaired and lessened productive power and weakened and degraded the human brain. It has become the enemy of the school, the church, and the home. It has done no good, but the greatest harm. In order that its baneful work might be mitigated, the people have tried to regulate it, but it has proven to be an outlaw—no law can restrain it. The American people have therefore determined that its existence shall end. It is a happy day for America when that can be truly said. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GOOD). The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, New York, it appears, has been most largely intrusted with the duty of speaking against this measure, and from that it might be inferred that New York was particularly anxious to prevent the passage of enforcement laws. Now, please do not make any mistake as to that. New York takes no such stand. It has its own enforcement law. New York stands for law and order, and it is not the first time in the history of this country that the Empire State has been so arrayed. It is not the first time in the history of this country that New York has stood for the fundamental principles which are at the basis of human liberty.

Since I have been in this body I have heard insinuations and words of comment which might be construed as offensive when weighed in their full import as applied to that organization which is known throughout the United States of America as Tammany Hall. That is not the real name of the organization. That is a nickname. The organization in question is, properly speaking, the Columbian Order, and it was founded in 1789, when the institutions of this country were in peril from reactionary forces; when there was no such thing as manhood suffrage, and that much-criticized society led the way in bringing manhood suffrage to fruition.

When the alien and sedition laws were passed, under the administration of that arch Federalist, John Adams, helped by Alexander Hamilton, it was the Columbian Order in New York City—Tammany Hall, if you please—which led the way in protest against those un-American measures and brought about their ultimate repeal, and also incidentally brought about the fall of the Federalist Party in the United States.

Now, New York is not against prohibition enforcement. But we are emphatically against Federal interference with the existing enforcement laws of the individual States or the laws which they may hereafter enact for that purpose. We are opposed to your writing into the eighteenth amendment a definition of the term "intoxicating liquors." That is not the function of the legislative branch of this Government, but belongs inherently in the United States Supreme Court and is essentially a matter of construction and not of legislative opinion. As you know, the Legislature of New York ratified the eighteenth amendment. Personally I believe that the legislature, in ratifying that amendment, did not speak the will of all the people of the State. I believe that the measure should have been submitted to a popular vote of the people. I do go this far and say that New York is in favor of temperance, in favor of temperate living. I was born in New York City, and I say to you gentlemen frankly that I have been in every part of it, both day and night, and I have seen very little of the abuse of liquor. No drunkenness, no crimes against women, no lynching, no disorder.

In fact, it may be said that the industrial populations in our great cities as a rule do not overindulge. This is, doubtless, as true of other industrial centers as it is of New York. Men occupied in useful employments—busy men—are rarely found to be intemperate in drink any more than in other appetites. It is only the idle who fall into vice. You who have these problems of idleness and intemperance to face in your own localities should take a broader and more tolerant view of the needs of others. Why should the great masses of industrial workers in our great cities be deprived of their personal freedom and be hampered by sumptuary laws to help you, in lawless localities, to control evil idlers?

The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] read two extracts, one from a Los Angeles paper and the other from a St. Louis paper, in which it was told how beautifully affairs went on in certain summer resorts under the beneficent influence of this law. What law? Was it the law that you gentlemen propose to pass here? How could that be before you pass it? No; it was the eighteenth amendment. And did it need any enforcement law to make those people respect the law and respect the Constitution? No. The law was respected because of the mere fact of the passage of the constitutional amendment. Instead of being an argument in favor of this law it is an argument against the passage of any enforcement law. You do not need it in the United States. Pass a constitutional amendment in due form and leave it to the manhood, leave it to the patriotism and the sense of self-respect of our citizenship. I assure you that they will enforce the law and they will respect it. I do not believe you have a right to pass an enforcement law. It is the first time in the history of this country that you have ever attempted to pass an enforcement law. We have amended our Constitution eighteen times. Examine these amendments carefully, gentlemen, and you will find this fact staring you in the face, that every constitutional amendment embraced in those 18 amendments was in enlargement of human rights. Each amendment gave a privilege, it gave something to the citizenship; it did not take anything away. This is the first amendment which has ever deprived the individual of fundamental rights. It is against every tradition, every principle of free institutions.

You have no right to pass an enforcement law. Why? Because precedent is against you. You have never done it before, following up the passage of any other constitutional amendment. You did not do it with the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, because those first 10 amendments were known as the Bill of Rights. They extended human liberty. You did not do it with the fourteenth amendment or the fifteenth amendment. Why? Because you were afraid to offend the principle of State rights. Now, State rights and State sovereignty are just as vital, just as inherent in American institutions to-day as they were at the foundation of this Government. Start on this path now, begin the precedent by passing this criminal code to enforce constitutional amendments, and see where you will land.

Personally I do not give the snap of my finger whether you pass this drastic law or not. I do not know but it might be a matter of good policy on the part of the opponents of this measure to let you go ahead and pass it. The men who are going to vote for this measure do not and will not know what is in it. They do not grasp the full import of its drastic provisions and the violations of individual rights that it contains. Go ahead and pass it and I am willing to trust the presidential veto, or, if it should go further, the final adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The only solicitude I have in the matter is that at a time when you are cutting off from the available revenue of the country heretofore received the immense volume of taxes from wines, beers, and spirituous liquors, and at a time when retrenchment should be observed in every legislative act, you are about to establish a stupendous governmental agency with vast hordes of revenue agents, inspectors, and other emissaries to irritate and pester the citizenship of our land and fatten themselves upon the Public Treasury. The loss of revenue due to prohibition for the next fiscal year is estimated to be about $600,000,000. When we add to that the inevitable loss of receipts from the income tax and excess-profit tax the total reduction of the national revenue will probably be near to $1,000,000,000. Instead of devising schemes to further reduce the national revenue, we ought to concern ourselves with the problem of increasing it.

It is almost too petty to believe, and yet the curious coincidence of the views of those hailing from the smaller States of the Union in favor of a national-enforcement act raises the suspicion that they are anxious to throw the expense of the enforcement of prohibition upon the Nation at large instead of upon the individual States, because they know that their States will only have to bear the merest fraction of the cost. This is selfish, unneighborly, and unjust. The States that pay the highest proportion of the national revenue in taxes will have to bear the principal burden of local enforcement of this odious and pernicious measure. And I warrant you that if this measure becomes a law there will be more of the national revenues frittered away in its enforcement in the States of many of you gentlemen, with your less than a million inhabitants, than will be expended for that purpose in the great imperial State of New York. In other words, there is a reasonably well-founded suspicion that you are trying to shirk your responsibilities.

I have no doubt that your resentment against drunkenness and its incidental and consequential crimes is fully justified. But may it not be justly asked if a large part or your trouble is not due to the defects in your educational facilities? Why not tax yourselves adequately and thus provide sufficient revenues to maintain schools? How can you expect intemperance of any kind to be driven out of human nature except by education? You can not drive murder out of the heart of primitive man by putting firearms beyond his reach. He will accomplish his purpose with club or stone or even with his bare hands. How can you expect to drive drunkenness away by laying the ban upon a few sources of abuse? Do not reply that you have enumerated in this bill a great many sources of temptation. You certainly have done all of that. Your failure is not due to want of industry in microscopic detail, but rather to want of understanding of human nature and failure to appreciate the fundamental principles of human liberty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] has one minute remaining.

Mr. IGOE. I want to take that one minute to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. The prohibitionists are such liberal people that they want the people of the country and the legislatures to have a free hand in passing upon these questions. I will ask the gentleman if his side is willing to give the House the chance on Monday, in the consideration of this bill, to vote for a straight-out repeal of the war-time prohibition law? I understood in all the speeches that were made here that this question should be freely and fairly considered by the people at large and by the legislatures. That is a fair proposition.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Personally I am not in a position to answer that question. There has been no discussion about it as far as I know.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman assist us in getting that opportunity for a vote?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not want to make any promise, because I do not know how the membership will feel about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would not occupy any time except for one fact. In the discussion here an effort has been made to show that the bill originated somewhere else than in the committee or membership of the House. I am perfectly willing to be frank with the House and tell them exactly where it originated. I do not think anybody has any hesitation in having their names connected with it who believe in prohibition. Two bills were introduced in the Senate, one by Senator JONES of Washington and another by Senator SHEPPARD. Anyone who cares can get copies of those bills. They were introduced some time before this bill was introduced. They were used as a basis on which this bill was drawn. The Senate Judiciary Committee attempted after this bill was introduced to make a comparison of the three bills. You can get a copy of that comparison and see how the three match. They were unable to match many of the sections of this bill with either of the Senate bills.

No one should draw a bill of this kind without making use of legislation that has been tried out in other jurisdictions. Anyone who would attempt to originate a bill without doing that would be exceedingly foolish. The bill was largely modeled on the Ohio law. I have the Ohio statute, and you will find a large number of these provisions in that statute. And, by the way, the Ohio statute is much more drastic than the provisions of this bill. I have it here so that I can satisfy anyone who is curious on the subject. Every State, I believe, that has a prohibition law has the essential features of this bill, including Iowa, Oregon, Kansas, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Nebraska, Idaho, Alaska, Washington, and I might mention a number of others.

Some reference has been made to the concurrent power of the State government with the Federal Government. In a way I am in some measure responsible for that provision. At a hearing before the Judiciary Committee I called their attention to one fact, that in case no reservation was made to the States Congress might set aside every State prohibition law in the Union. I was not willing to risk any such thing as that, and for that reason suggested to the committee that a reservation of power in the States to deal with the matter ought to be embodied in the amendment.

When this amendment was passed in the Senate and came here to the House it had no such reservation, and I again insisted that it ought to go into the amendment. I do not mean to suggest that there was any real opposition to the proposition in the committee. I think it is a wise and proper provision. I did not have anything to do with drafting the provision; however, I think the language is all right.

I am not going to discuss the constitutionality of it. I do not think that needs any argument. The cases cited in opposition to it clearly prove that a State or the National Government can pass criminal laws for the enforcement of it, and that is all we expect or ask to do in this bill. There can be no conflict, and it seems utterly ridiculous to me to expect that the Supreme Court will take the view that has been suggested.

One thing more in closing, I have followed this discussion with a good deal of interest, and I have noticed that nearly every one that has objected to this bill because of its alleged unconstitutionality comes from a large wet city. Why is it that only the large wet cities can see anything unconstitutional in it? Why is it the representatives of such localities especially object to it as drastic and unfair? Is there any connection between their view of the law and their opposition to this measure.

Many of these men not only urge that it is drastic and unconstitutional but that we ought not to enforce the amendment at all. They insist that we ought to ignore the will of the people as expressed in this amendment. This bill is not drastic. I hold in my hand a compilation of the New York liquor laws. In that State you provide for a search warrant much more drastic than we have. You have an injunction provision in the New York law to stop the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor the same as we have in this bill. It is more drastic than anything we have, and still the Representatives from New York hold up their hands in holy horror. Turn to any one of the prohibition States and you will find the same situation. You will find, I believe, in every State a provision for issuing a search warrant for taking liquor held in violation of law, and many have provisions for search without a warrant. We do not allow anything of that kind. We provide for a warrant, and it can not be issued except under the most stringent regulations.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Can the gentleman find anything in the New York law which delegates the function of a magistrate to a revenue officer, as you do in this measure?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We do nothing of the kind. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. The New York code allows any justice of the peace or magistrate to issue search warrants. We do not permit anything of the kind; we permit only a court of record or a United States commissioner to issue search warrants. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman find anything in the New York law which permits a man who swears out the warrant to execute it and then to sit as a committing magistrate?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; and there is no such provision in this bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, sure you do in your section 2 of the bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will show it to the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The search-warrant proposition is a copy of the New York code modified so as to make it less drastic than the New York code. That is the actual situation. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. I understand the gentleman yields?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN (reading)—

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, shall investigate and report violations of this act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who shall be charged with the duty of prosecuting the offenders, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, as in the case of other offenses against the laws of the United States—

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not permit the gentleman to take up my time by reading the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN (reading)—

* * * and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, may swear out warrants before United States commissioners or other officers or courts——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I object to the gentleman's continuing the reading of that in my time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is only just a line. The gentleman challenged my statement, and I want to show the gentleman that he is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The provision in there simply gives some of those officers——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], having the floor, yielded to the gentleman from New York and asked him to read this.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled, and the gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the Chair will bear with me, I know the Chair wants to be fair, and I am arguing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand; but will the Chair listen to my argument?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. CALDWELL. So the Chair refuses to listen to the discussion of this point of order?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That provision simply authorizes one of those officers to swear out a complaint and to go before a magistrate to prosecute it.

Mr. GRIFFIN (reading)—

* * * and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the committing trial.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, I know that by heart, and I refuse to yield further. It has not anything to do with a search warrant, but is an entirely different subject, and does not authorize what you claim at all. Read it again, and you will probably see how ridiculous the claim is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I rise to ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute. I gave back one minute of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired as fixed by the House.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will this bill be read by sections or by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read by sections.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be now read for amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At what point in the reading of this bill would it be in order to move to strike out title 1?

The CHAIRMAN. At the end of the first section, that part of title 1, the motion to strike out would be in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Chair ruled the first section should be read and at the conclusion of the reading of that first section it would be in order to move to strike out title 1.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to move to strike out section 1 and give notice that if section 1 is stricken out a similar motion will be made to strike out the subsequent sections of title 1. The clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I.

TO PROVIDE FOR THE ENFORCEMENT OF WAR PROHIBITION.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I want to be sure that the Chair has ruled that the reading of the first section, if completed, would not prejudice the right to offer amendments up to that point as to striking out the title. A parliamentary inquiry——

The CHAIRMAN. After the first section has been read then it will be in order to move to strike out.

Mr. IGOE. I ask unanimous consent at this point to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota, for the benefit of the House, if it is his plan to rise when the reading of the first section has been completed and reserve the right to offer amendments to that section, to be considered on Monday and offered on Monday?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I presume under the parliamentary rules that will be correct, and it is my intention to move that the committee rise as soon as the first section has been completed.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the term "war prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the motion of the gentleman prevails, will that still leave it in order on Monday to move to strike out section 1?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. GARNER. Or any other amendment that may be offered to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other germane amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Either a perfecting amendment or an amendment to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Another question. A motion to perfect section 1 would have preference over a motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it would not prejudice, after any perfecting amendments were considered, the right to move to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not. That would be in order after all perfecting amendments had been passed upon and before the reading of the second paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Might it be offered and remain pending during the consideration of perfecting amendments?

Mr. CALDWELL. By unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so, but only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the Chair is wrong about that. I think it is in order for gentlemen to offer any amendment, but the vote would not be taken on the motion to strike out until all perfecting amendments had been voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6810 and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last I introduced a House resolution in relation to the creating of a bureau in the Department of Labor which had to do with living and housing conditions. I ask unanimous consent to insert a statement in the RECORD in relation to that bill, explaining it and the necessity for its prompt consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject stated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Monday, July 14, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I present a concurrent resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, favoring the granting of additional compensation to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 3, requesting Congress to grant additional compensation to soldiers, sailors, and marines who have served in the military or naval service of the United States during the present war.

Whereas the regular pay granted to such soldiers, sailors, and marines has been, and is, extremely low, especially as compared with wages and salary paid to all classes of labor in the United States during the period of the war;

Whereas enormous profits have been received in practically all classes of manufacturing industry, in which the said soldiers, sailors, and marines have been prevented from sharing because of their service; and

Whereas it is the belief of the people of the State of Michigan and of this legislative body that some measure of appreciation should be shown for the sacrifice and courage of our soldiers, sailors, and marines: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Michigan (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be requested to grant and pay to each soldier, sailor, and marine who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during any part of the period of the World War, or to the proper relatives or dependents of any soldier, sailor, or marine who has lost his life in said war an additional compensation of at least $50 per month for the period of service; be it further

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 6, memorializing the Congress to favorably consider pending legislation looking toward increased compensation for postal employees.

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States legislation looking toward increased pay for all postal employees; and

Whereas under present conditions it is plainly evident that such employees are underpaid, as evidenced by the large number of resignations from the service to enable such employees to take up more remunerative occupations, thus resulting in impaired postal service: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That it is the sense of this legislature that such compensation should be increased, and to this end Congress is hereby memorialized to favorably consider the pending legislation now before it granting increased compensation to such postal employees; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the United States, and to the Senators and Members of Congress from Michigan.

Whereas the covenant of the league of nations is presented to the United States for popular action; and

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs, now assembled in biennial session, representing the interests of 2,000,000 women and exerting the influence they may exercise in their communities:

Resolved, That the council send its approval of the revised covenant of the league of nations to members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, the President of the United States now in France; and

That the members of the State federations ask their Senators to vote in support of the league of nations.

LEAGUE OF FREE NATIONS ASSOCIATION,
New York City, July 9, 1919.

Senator KEY PITTMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed resolution, based upon a referendum vote of members throughout the country, was passed last night at a national conference of this association.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES G. MCDONALD, Chairman.

Resolved, That the League of Free Nations Association, in accordance with a referendum of its full membership, calls upon all forward-looking citizens to urge the United States Senate—

1. To ratify without reservations the treaty with Germany, including the league of nations covenant.

Such ratification would establish immediate peace, the world's most urgent need in the interest of order and progress; would abolish many international injustices which have proved prolific causes of war, and would create an agency for the rectification of remaining injustices and for the establishment of mutually advantageous and just relations between nations.

2. To accompany its ratification with a resolution declaring it to be the purpose of the United States as a member of the league of nations to:

(a) Press for the immediate restoration of Kiao-Chau and the German concessions in Shantung to the Chinese Republic.

(b) Hold that nothing in the treaty or the covenant shall be construed as authorizing interference by the league in internal revolutions or as preventing genuine redress and readjustment of boundaries through orderly processes provided by the league at any time in the future that these may be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the people concerned.

(c) Call for the inclusion of Germany in the council of the league as soon as the new republic shall have entered in good faith upon carrying out the treaty provisions; for the inclusion of Russia as soon as the Russian people have established stable government; and for the full participation of both Germany and Russia on equal footing in all economic intercourse as the best insurance against any reversion to the old scheme of balance of power, economic privilege, and war.

(d) Press for the progressive reduction of armaments by all nations.

(e) Throw its whole weight in behalf of such changes in the constitution and such developments in the practice of the league as will make it more democratic in its scheme of representation, its procedure more legislative and less exclusively diplomatic, an instrument of growth invigorated and molded by the active democratic forces of the progressive nations.

LEAGUE FOR PERMANENT PEACE,
Boston, Mass., July 1, 1919.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call to your attention the inclosed copy of a resolution passed after an address on the league of nations.

Very truly, yours, KATE FOSTER GORHAM,
Executive Secretary.

JUNE 30, 1919.

We believe that the United States should enter the proposed league of nations in order to bring about international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security; and

We recognize that the covenant of the league of nations can not be separated from the peace treaty, since the latter is founded on the assumption that this league of nations will be formed; and

We believe that delay on the part of the United States Senate to ratify the peace treaty will seriously jeopardize the peace of the world: Therefore

We, the undersigned citizens of Massachusetts, urge the United States Senate to ratify the treaty of peace, including the covenant, without reservation or amendment, as soon as it is submitted for ratification.

MRS. J. MALCOLM FORBES,
Chairman of Meeting,
(and others).

Passed by unanimous vote at a large public meeting June 30, 1919, at the headquarters of the League for Permanent Peace, 421 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.

421 BOYLSTON STREET,

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,

Yours, very truly, M. T. OSMOND.

We believe that the United States should enter the league of nations, which aims to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security.

We believe that the covenant of the league of nations can not be separated from the peace treaty, since the latter was founded on the assumption that the league of nations would be formed.

We believe that delay on the part of the United States Senate to ratify the peace treaty will seriously jeopardize the peace of the world: Therefore

We urge the United States Senate to ratify the treaty of peace, including the covenant, without reservation or amendment as soon as it is submitted for ratification.

The above resolution was adopted by a large majority at a public meeting held Wednesday, July 9, 1919, at Pilgrim Hall, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

NEVADA WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION,
Reno, Nev., June 2, 1919.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senator from Nevada, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Nevada Woman's Christian Temperance Union instructed the following resolution to be sent you, with thanks for the stand you have ever taken for measures of progress and justice:

Resolution.

"Whereas the United States entered the war to add its great force in joint effort with other free nations thereby to end the cruel war being enacted against human rights by Germany; and

"Whereas the war was brought to a victorious end through this united effort: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we indorse the establishment of a league of nations. We believe a league of nations would be a check on future wars and would protect all nations from a war such as was indulged in by Germany at the expense of the world; be it further

"Resolved, That we favor the entrance of the United States into a league of nations, the aim of which is to hold vantage power—won by allied forces at the cost of sacred human life—to promote freedom, progress, and peaceful cooperation in the development of the world; be it still further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Senators representing the State of Nevada at Washington, and to the Hon. William H. Taft, president of the League to Enforce Peace, No. 130 West Street, New York."

NEVADA WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION,
MRS. NORA R. LINVILLE, State President.
By MRS. BESSIE R. EICHELBERGER,
State Recording Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report (No. 80) accompanied by a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 70) relating to the induction of registrants who applied, and who were accepted, for induction and assigned to educational institutions for special and technical training under the provisions of the act approved August 31, 1918, but whose induction without fault of their own was not completed.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2220) granting to the Lincoln Highway Association, incorporated under the laws of the State of Michigan, a right of way through certain public lands of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 79) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 429) to authorize an exchange of lands with Henry Blackburn (Rept. No. 77); and

A bill (S. 1729) permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry or other entry of the public lands of the United States (Rept. No. 78).

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate resolution 110, requesting the President to send to the Senate a copy of the treaty between Germany and Japan, negotiated between Oda, Japanese plenipotentiary, and the German Ambassador Lucius, reported it favorably with amendments and submitted a report (No. 84) thereon.

Mr. FALL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate resolution 105, requesting the Secretary of State to inform the Senate why Nicaragua is permitted to invade Costa Rica; and why Costa Rica was not permitted to sign the treaty of peace at Versailles, reported it favorably with amendments and submitted a report (No. 83) thereon.

TAO HUNG CHANG AND ZENG TZE WONG.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 120) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Tao Hung Chang and Zeng Tze Wong, citizens of China, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on Friday I was authorized to report a duplicate bill. This joint resolution had then passed the House of Representatives, but the Senate was not in session on Saturday, or on Friday for that matter, and I was authorized to wait until the House bill had been handed down in the Senate. I report the joint resolution back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs and ask unanimous consent that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator from New York kindly advise us why this extraordinary action should be taken with reference to these two men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The West Point course which these men have been sent from China to take part in has commenced, but there was a misunderstanding as to the number who were to come. The two Chinese students are here, and they can not be taken into the academy until authorized by an act of this sort. Each day makes an added embarrassment in their situation. This request comes as an urgent call from the War Department.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Do we undertake at West Point to educate students sent to the institution from other countries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On several prior occasions Chinese students have been admitted to the West Point Military Academy. These students have arrived in the United States pursuant to an invitation and the general understanding of the War Department, based upon precedents in the past.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What other nations send students to West Point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My recollection is that we have admitted a couple of Filipino students to West Point. We have had one or two Chinese students there for some time. In this case a misunderstanding arose as to the number of Chinese. The Chinese Government very thoroughly understood that two students were to be admitted. The two have arrived, and the War Department is very anxious to have their admission authorized by Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Has the policy of the admission of Chinese students to the academy been the subject of earnest consideration by the Military Affairs Committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it was authorized by Congress some time ago. There is nothing new in the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEAR EAST RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. On behalf of the Judiciary Committee I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 180) to incorporate Near East Relief, and I ask for its present consideration. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session. There is urgent need for its passage now, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why this organization may not be incorporated under the District law or under the law of some State? I should like to ask the Senator where he finds authority for the Federal Government to charter a private organization for the purpose of carrying on private work or philanthropic work?

Mr. CUMMINS. This is incorporated as a corporation of the District of Columbia. I do not think there is any ordinance or law in the District of Columbia that would enable these people to incorporate to the same advantage and effect that they can incorporate under an act of Congress. It is the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KING. I shall ask that the bill be read. My opinion is that the bill has many objections, and there is serious question made as to the power of the Federal Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. KING. No; I do not object to the consideration of the bill. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KING. If I may interrupt the reading, will the Senator from Iowa consent to hold his request in abeyance until I can have an opportunity to examine the bill? I was compelled to be absent from the committee this morning. After the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has concluded his remarks I shall join with the Senator to-day in requesting that the bill be brought up for consideration.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. There is a great demand for the passage of this bill. There are a great many people in Minnesota, in the Twin Cities especially, who are very anxious to give relief to the Armenians, and they feel that they can not well do it unless we have this corporation operated. In order that we may help to promote the cause of the poor Armenians and secure ample funds in this country the bill ought to pass. I trust the Senator from Utah will consent to its passage.

Mr. KING. I have had many requests of the same character as those to which the Senator refers, and of course I am entirely in sympathy with any proposition that will secure relief for the Armenians, but I do have some question as to the right and power of the Federal Government to give a charter for private purposes.

My request, however, is merely that the matter be laid over temporarily until I can have an opportunity to examine the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I certainly will yield to the request made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I do hope that during the day we may be able to consider the bill. It is of the highest importance that if it is to become a law at all it shall become a law within a very few days.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that even though I conclude to oppose the bill, I shall join in the request that it be taken up during the day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I withdraw the request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside temporarily.

WHITE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 2254) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo., and I submit a report (No. 82) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] to the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. If there is no objection, I ask for the present consideration of the bill. At the last session of Congress authority was given to construct a bridge at Forsyth across the White River in Missouri. The commencement of the bridge was prevented because of the war. The War Department has reported favorably upon the extension for a year of the time within which the bridge may be commenced. Such extension is provided for by this bill. If there be no objection, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 5, after the word "built," to insert "by the Forsyth special road district of Taney County, Mo."; and in line 7, after the word "date," to insert "of approval," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by an act of Congress approved April 8, 1918, to be built by the Forsyth special road district of Taney County, Mo., across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOAN OF TENTS.

Mr. LENROOT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 65) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents for use at encampments held by veterans of the World War, and I submit a report (No. 81) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the last proviso of H. J. Res. 11, approved March 2, 1913, be, and the same is, amended to read as follows:

"That hereafter no loans of tents shall be made except to the Grand Army of the Republic, the United Confederate Veterans, the United Spanish War Veterans, and to recognized organizations of veterans of the late World War by whatever name they may be known."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate concurrent resolution 5, submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 10th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone and without maps, 10,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 40,000 for the use of the Senate.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM B. WILSON.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 117), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Vice President on June 30, 1919, entitled "Speech of Secretary of Labor Wilson at Atlantic City, June 13, 1919," be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM B. WILSON, SECRETARY OF LABOR, BEFORE THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., JUNE 13, 1919.

"Mr. President and fellow trades-unionists, it is a great pleasure to have the opportunity of being present, even though it may be at but one of the sessions of this historic victory and reconstruction convention of the American Federation of Labor.

"The wageworkers of our country have reason to be proud of the part which they played in the great World War for freedom and democracy. You have reason to be proud not only of the part you have taken in the struggle but of the great part that has been played in the contest by your seelcted representative, the president of the American Federation of Labor. [Applause.] Upon him has devolved not only the direction of your forces and associated forces in the great struggle against the military autocracy of Germany, but there has also fallen upon his shoulders—and he has borne the burden manfully; he has directed the movement intelligently—the great burden of conducting the battle against the other insidious forces that would endeavor to utilize violence for the destruction of democracy—the powers of Bolshevism as expressed in some of the countries of eastern Europe.

"The part played by labor has been due in a great measure to the appreciation by labor of the development that has taken place in the progress of human democracies.

"I have a theory, and time alone will demonstrate whether the theory is sound, that every individual and every group of individuals becomes influential in the affairs of the Government just in so far as the individual or the group of individuals is necessary for the defense of the State. I know my British friends will pardon me if I refer to what in my mind was the great starting point in the development of modern democracy. I do not look upon the Battle of Bannockburn as being purely the heritage of the people of Scotland alone, but I look upon it as being the heritage of the masses of the people of all the world. Those of you who are familiar with the history of that struggle and the ones preceding it realize that up until that time the only people who had been permitted to participate in the affairs of government were the monarchs and the nobility, the nobility comprising the flower of knighthood. The nobility were permitted to participate because the man on horseback and in armor was the man who at that time was necessary for the defense of the State. Nearly all of the nobility of Scotland had been brought up at the court of England, and when the Battle of Bannockburn took place very few of the men in armor were on the side of the Scottish monarch. He had to depend for his support in the conflict upon the yeomanry of his country, and for the first time in the history of warfare the yeomanry, with pikes in their hands, were formed on the battle field of Bannockburn in what has since come to be known as the hollow square, only in that case it was the hollow circle. The historians have failed to grasp the importance of that situation. They tell us of the pitfalls that had been made on the moor for the horses of the English monarch and his men, and how some of these fell into the pits. There were a sufficient number who crossed over the moor to have crushed the Scottish army if it had not been for the new military tactics which the necessity of the situation compelled Bruce to employ, and he formed his men into hollow circles to receive the men of the opposing forces on their pikes, and when the nobles came they came onto the pikes of the yeomanry and were destroyed. The yeoman at that moment became a more important factor in the defense of his country. The British monarch was later compelled to follow the same tactics that Bruce had followed. And when the wars were carried by Edward over onto the Continent, with the yeomen as a fighting factor in his armies, the European military chiefs were compelled also to change their tactics. From that period dated the fall of knighthood and the beginning of manhood. [Applause.]

"Slowly the masses of the people represented in the yeomanry began to realize their importance, and before the reign of Bruce had passed they had compelled him to yield concessions to the yeomanry of his country, and this was true also of Edward and true over all the Continent.

"The individual, the man in the mass, the toiler of society, began to see the dawn of a new day. It took centuries before it began to crystallize, but those same people, coming over to our country, settling on our shores, carried with them the ideals of the importance of the workers of humanity. When our Declaration of Independence was proclaimed to the world, when it was being prepared before it was given to the world, there came down from the North those who insisted that there should be included in the document the statement that taxation without representation was tyranny, and there came up from the South workers who in the meantime had become imbued with a spirit of racial aristocracy, but yet were imbued with the same thought that had developed on the other side of the water, who insisted that there should go into the Declaration of Independence that basic principle of all democracies—that every government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. [Applause.]

"Modern warfare has still more thoroughly accentuated that thought. In the battles of ancient times it was frequently possible for large armies to support themselves upon the country in which they were operating, receiving but a small portion of their supplies from home. From the days when Joshua overcame the enemies of Israel until Sherman made his famous march to the sea great armies supported themselves upon the country in which they were fighting. That is no longer possible. It has been variously estimated that it takes anywhere from 6 to 10 workers in the rear to maintain 1 soldier in the trenches. Consequently the workers of all the world have become more important factors in the defense of their respective countries, and they are insisting and will continue to insist that in the consideration of the problems of reconstruction the laws shall be so constructed and social affairs so conducted that every individual in the community shall have the greatest possible opportunity for self-determination. [Applause.]

"The labor movement of this country is no exception to the rule in that respect. We have in our country our faddists—people, many of them, who have never had experience in the practical problems of life. Some of them have been following after false gods. It is not those who are following after the false gods that will be the saviors of the workers of our country. It is those who have persistently made and are continuing to make self-sacrifice for the common good who will achieve results.

"I recall, and I may have mentioned it to you on previous occasions, but it will bear repeating—I recall the conditions we found in the Middle West when the President's Mediation Commission was sent out to investigate the conditions brought about by the activities of the Industrial Workers of the World some two years ago. The Industrial Workers of the World had almost gone out of existence prior to that time. Suddenly there was a renewal of activities. Industries that were essential for the success of the war were being tied up. There seemed to be no way of keeping them in operation. The President appointed a commission of which I had the honor of being chairman. We found some oddities and many crude theories that the average man in the labor movement would not stand for. We found that people were coming in on the roads to the mining camps of the mountain regions, coming in quite large numbers, and practically overnight establishing locals of the Industrial Workers of the World, and then, without submitting the questions to the voice of the workers themselves, either through organization or otherwise, declaring strikes against the companies that were operating; declaring those strikes for a given wage and for a given number of hours, refusing to meet the employers in conference and insisting that it must be this rate which they published and no other, and that idleness would follow the employers' refusal to comply with their demands.

"But that was not all. We found that wherever the legitimate evolutionary aspirations of the workers were given an opportunity to develop, there the I. W. W. found no foothold; that it was only in the places where there was the iron hand of repression on the part of the employer used upon the workers themselves that this peculiarly revolutionary spirit found expression. It found expression in addition to the manner I have stated in the philosophy that was being taught.

"They announced as the basis of their movement the philosophy that every man is entitled to the full social value of what his labor produces. Now that philosophy is purely of socialistic origin. It had its first exponent in Marx. It is also a philosophy that every individualist can subscribe to with thoroughness and with complete acceptance of the principle. Every man is entitled to the full social value of what his labor produces. The great difficulty has been that human intelligence has not yet devised a method by which we can compute what the social value is of anyone's labor. No one can compute the value of your labor; no one can compute the value of my labor; no one can compute the value of the labor that has been performed by the president of this organization, or the labor that was performed by the man with a pick and shovel in the ditch. Our intelligence has not yet devised a method by which we can compute it, and so, in the years gone by, we have endeavored to make the computation by one of three processes—by the process of the employer using his economic power to arbitrarily fix the compensation of the workers; by the process of the worker, using his collective power, arbitrarily fixing the compensation and imposing it upon the employer; and by the process of negotiation.

"It is the process of negotiation that the American labor movement has insisted upon for the bringing of the different elements together and endeavoring to work the problems out on as equitable a basis as the circumstances will permit. But there is a wide misapprehension of the scope of the labor movement of our country. There are those who assume that the negotiations that the American labor movement seeks with the employers only involve consideration of the question of wages or the hours of labor. But the negotiations that the American wage workers, the labor movement of America, stand for include in their scope every industrial activity that affects the mental, the material, or the spiritual welfare of mankind.

"They laid down as the second step in their philosophy that property is only valuable in so far as profits can be secured from the property, that if you eliminate the profits the property will become valueless and no one will want to retain it; and that, so far as it goes, is also sound. If there is nothing that can be produced from a piece of property that will be valuable to mankind, then no one wants to be bothered with the possession of that property.

"Then came what to my mind and to the minds of the great bulk of the trade-unionists of this country that I have come in contact with was the poison in their whole philosophy. They said that the way to destroy the value of the property was to strike upon the job—that is, to 'soldier,' as we say here in the East; to produce a stint, as they say in Great Britain; to put sand on the bearings, to break the machinery, to reduce production, and to reduce the amount of returns from labor to as small a point as possible and enable the worker to retain his job; then in this way the profits would be destroyed, the value would be eliminated, the owner would no longer desire to retain the property and it could be taken over by the workers, operated collectively, and the workers secure the full value of what their labor produced.

"Whatever there may be of value in the collective ownership and operation of property, there is at least no value whatsoever in that method of bringing it about. [Applause.]

"All we had to do amongst those workers in the Middle West was to point to the historical fact that prior to the rebirth of the inventive genius of man, prior to the building up of our modern factory system with its wonderful processes of machinery, when everything that was produced was produced by hand, there was a much smaller production per individual than could possibly result from any system of sabotage that could now be introduced; and yet in those days there were still profits for the employers and there was still value to the property. What did result was a very much lower standard of living for the workers; and the only thing that would result from such a scheme now would be a lower standard of living for the wage workers of the present, and our wage workers are not going to stand for any system that will lower their standards of living.

"The employers and the employees have a mutual interest in securing the largest possible production with a given amount of labor, having due regard to the health, the safety, the opportunities for rest, recreation, and improvement of the workers. These being safeguarded, the larger the amount that is produced the larger will be the amount that there is to divide. If there is nothing produced, there will be nothing to divide; if there is a large amount produced, there will be a large amount to divide. Their interests diverge only when it comes to a division of what has been mutually produced; and if they are wise in their generation in these modern times, with labor realizing its importance in the defense of the country and the maintenance of the country, instead of solving the problem by the use of the economic power on the part of the employer, imposing his will upon the worker, or the use of collective power on the part of the employees imposing their will upon the employers, they will sit around the council table and endeavor to work out the problem on a democratic basis that will secure to each all that he is entitled to receive. [Applause.]

"Closely allied to the work of the I. W. W., during the past year at least, there has been more or less Bolshevist agitation in the United States. It has not been to any great etxent prevalent amongst the real workers of the country; it has existed principally amongst the 'parlor coal diggers' of our greater cities. I have no fear of a political revolution in the United States. It may be possible that these 'parlorites' may misguide a sufficient number of laboring men to cause local disturbances that will be annoying, but no one in the ranks of labor, whether he is classed as an extreme radical or an extreme conservative, or any of the elements between these two, will stand for Bolshevism for a minute when he knows what Bolshevism itself stands for.

"They talk a great deal about the dictatorship of the proletariat. We who have been more or less familiar with the theories that have been promulgated by Marx and his assertion of the dictatorship of the proletariat had interpreted the term to mean that a majority of the workers of the land would determine the policy of it and impose it upon the balance of our people. And our workers are not willing to accept even that kind of a principle. They realized the many centuries of struggle there had been to secure the franchise on the part of the workers in the face of the claims that had been made that they had no property to be taxed, and, having no property to be taxed, they should have no voice in imposing the taxes; and, further, that they had not developed enough; that they had not sufficient intelligence to be permitted to participate in the affairs of state. During all the centuries there has been a struggle to remedy the wrong, and the basis of that struggle, the basis of the contention of the workers, has been that every person who has to obey the laws of a country ought to have a voice in determining what those laws should be. Having fought all through the centuries for the accomplishment of that ideal, having accomplished this purpose, the American workingman was not disposed to impose the same kind of a disfranchisement upon other portions of the people that he did not want imposed upon himself.

"The Bolshevists did not even take that interpretation of the dictatorship of the proletariat as their guide in the countries where they are just now supreme. In his long speech before the national soviet at Moscow a little more than a year ago, Lenin laid down the principle that the dictatorship of the proletariat meant the dictatorship of a self-selected, so-called 'advance guard'; that the proletariat himself was not to be trusted because he would waiver, and that this self-selected advance guard would impose its will upon the workers and the others must obey, and in that obedience was included obligatory labor.

"From the time that Moses led the Israelites out of bondage in Egypt until Lincoln issued the emancipation proclamation the struggle of the masses has been to get away from slavery, to get away from compulsory labor, and yet it is proposed by this new form of government to reintroduce obligatory labor upon the workers of the world, imposed upon them by a small group of the 'parlorites' of Russia. The great distinction between slavery and freedom is that under freedom every man shall have the right to cease work for any reason that may be sufficient to himself. [Applause.]

"We have protested to the extent of sacrificing our blood and our treasure against the military autocracy of Germany, and yet the military autocracy of Germany was built upon the selfsame idea, that the Kaiser and his group of advisers knew better what the workingman desired, what he needed, and what was good for him, than the workers knew themselves, and this new group is setting itself up as the advance guard, taking exactly the same position that they know better what is good for the workers than the workers know themselves, and that one of the things that is good for them is that they must be compelled to labor at any price that the advance guard may say, at any kind of work they may determine, for any number of hours the advance guard may decide upon, and the powers of government are to be used to enforce that will. That is their policy.

"The American workingman wants nothing of that kind of dictatorship of the proletariat. The American workingman wants nothing of that kind of obligatory labor. The American workingman wants nothing of the political, social, or economic conditions that have existed and still exist in Russia. We have worked out our destiny far beyond that stage, and we are going to continue to work it out to the achievement of higher ideals, not by the will of an advance guard, no matter how right or just their position may be, but by the will of the majority themselves.

"The use of force, as some of these people are advocating, for the overthrow of our institutions, we will not tolerate. Why, my friends, our institutions have been until recently the most completely democratic institutions in the world, and it is only recently that Great Britain has come up shoulder to shoulder with us. Our Declaration of Independence, while it declared, as I have stated, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, did not give to all of the people a voice in the affairs of state. The adoption of our Constitution did not give that right, that privilege. It was not until after 60 or 70 years of struggle that there came to the workers of our country practically universal manhood suffrage and every element in our country had at least the right to a voice in determining how the affairs of state should be conducted.

"In eastern Europe they had not reached that stage of development. The workers were not permitted to have a voice in determining the affairs. The only method by which they could bring about change was by the use of force. Force over there and force here are two different propositions. The use of force to overthrow an autocracy may be the highest kind of patriotism. But the use of force to overthrow a democracy is treason to the masses of the people. We are proceeding by evolution, not by revolution. We have the power of the ballot to remedy our grievances. If we fail to use the ballot rightly the fault is our own. And those of us who can not be depended upon to vote right can not be depended upon to shoot right. [Applause.] And may I add that in making that statement I am not advocating either the attachment to any political party or the creation of any new political party. Our conditions here are very much different from the conditions on the other side of the ocean. Over there there is a snug little island. The great majority of their people are engaged in industrial and commercial pursuits. A separate party over there can, without having an accession from the intellectuals, become a majority party. That is not the case in our country. There are just as many people engaged in agricultural pursuits, in pursuits that do not lend themselves to organizations, as there are engaged in industrial pursuits, and even if we were able to solidify all of the wage workers of the country in a common mass, as the others would solidify against us, we could not become a majority party, and any progress we might attempt to make would be retarded as a result of the partisan feeling that would be engendered by virtue of these contests. And so we are in a position where we can, if we will, organize a separate party, or we can pursue the policy that has been pursued successfully so far, and that is to throw the weight of our support, of our influence, to the individuals or to the parties that for the time being are willing to go along with our program.

"May I also, Mr. President, take this opportunity of giving a word of advice in connection with another situation that has been tense throughout the country? The advice is given freely, honestly, and earnestly. You may accept it or leave it as your own judgment tells you is best. I have been very much interested in the Mooney case. I was requested by the President when his commission went West to look into the Mooney case and report to him. We looked into the Mooney case, and in doing so we came to this conclusion: That, so far as the jury was concerned that passed upon the evidence presented to it, it could have come to no other conclusion under its sworn duty than to convict Mooney; that, so far as the judge was concerned who tried the case, he tried it with absolute fairness. But there were some things existing in addition to that. At the time of the trial certain evidence had been given by certain individuals relative to the supposed activities of Mooney. It afterwards developed that one of the principal witnesses had written to a friend of his in Illinois asking him to come to San Francisco and be prepared to testify that he had seen Oxman, the witness, at a given point at a given time, so as to testify to the possibility of Oxman's being at the point where he claimed to have secured the evidence. The commission was of the opinion that in view of that change in the evidence, and in view of other changes that had taken place in the evidence from the date of trial, Mooney ought to be given a new trial, and his innocence or guilt decided upon the evidence as it existed when this new evidence was produced. [Applause.]

"At that time I had no fixed opinions as to either the guilt or the innocence of Mooney. With me it was not a question of whether Mooney was guilty or was innocent, but a question of securing a fair trial for him under the existing circumstances. [Applause.] Every effort that the national administration was able to put forth was put forth for the purpose of trying to secure that new trial, and we are not through with it yet. We are still working on it. [Applause, long and continued.]

"But that is not the phase of the situation that I particularly wanted to advise you about. I am simply stating these facts as preliminary to what is to follow. There has been carried on throughout the country a nation-wide agitation for a universal strike as a protest against the conviction of Mooney. My friends, do you realize just what that action means to the masses of the people? Do you understand fully—most of you do—the struggle that has taken place in order that trials may take place by jury where people are accused, with the accused having the opportunity of meeting the witnesses and the jury face to face, and the jury having the opportunity of witnessing the manner in which the witnesses give their testimony? That change, the establishment of the jury system, was not brought about for the purpose of protecting the monarch or protecting the nobility. It has not been principally essential for the protection of men of great wealth; they have usually been in a position to protect themselves. The jury system was brought into existence for the purpose of protecting poor fellows like you and me from the power and influence of the other fellows.

"It may occasionally miscarry; occasionally an injustice or a wrong may be done, but in the great bulk of cases justice is meted out through the jury system. Neither you nor I nor anyone in the labor movement, no one who belongs to the great masses of our people, can afford to undertake to try Mooney by the process of a strike. [Applause.] If he is to be tried he should be tried by a jury that can meet him face to face and meet the witnesses face to face and be able to digest the evidence as it comes out, bit by bit. Very few of us have had an opportunity of examining the evidence in the Mooney case, very few of us know anything more about the Mooney case than simply that which is connected with Oxman, one of the principal witnesses, and yet it is proposed that every workingman in the country, whether he has information concerning the Mooney case or not, shall become a juror in this case, and at the same time that he becomes a juror shall enter into a strike to bring about a decision. What influence will it have? The man who under our laws can pardon him or liberate him from prison is not under the jurisdiction of the voters of any other part of the country than that of California. And I do not know but that, even though there may be a miscarriage of justice occasionally, it is a wise thing that that is the case. The further you get the responsible officers removed from the electorate the less influence the electorate has with those responsible officers, and while the responsible officers may occasionally pursue a course that is not acceptable to the multitude, it is better that they should be close to the multitude, close to the electorate, than that they should be far removed, as would be the case if the responsibility rested with the Federal official instead of with the State or local official.

"My friends, we in this country have been moving on by the evolutionary processes, taking hold of the problems that confront us, holding fast to that which experience demonstrates to be good, letting loose of those things which experience demonstrates to be bad. It is the safest method, the surest method. Revolutionary processes may move us forward rapidly for a brief period. On the other hand, the chances are that when a revolution takes place no one will be able to determine where it will end. That has been true of nearly all the revolutions of the world, and the policy that has been pursued by the American labor movement of going forward by evolutionary processes, making sure of each foothold with every step that it takes, so that there will be no step backward, is the surest and best process for the achievement of the highest ideals of mankind. I thank you. [Applause, long and continued.]"

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOSEPH E. RANSDELL.

Mr. GAY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] before the graduating class of the Louisiana State University at Baton Rouge on June 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

AMERICA'S PART IN THE WORLD WAR.

(Address of United States Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL before the graduating class of Louisiana State University at Baton Rouge, June 16, 1919.)

"In order to appreciate the part played by the United States in the World War, which practically ceased on the 11th of November last, we must diagnose the general situation when our country entered the combat, and understand the truly colossal proportions of this the greatest war that ever afflicted mankind. On April 6, 1917, when war was declared by Congress, Germany and her allies had been remarkably successful; their armies had been victorious in many battles and large areas had been conquered; their submarines were rapidly destroying ships of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and vessels of neutral nations, including our own, were suffering terribly.

"War in its most horrible and ruthless form, a war of savagery such as the world had not witnessed for centuries, convulsed all Europe and portions of Asia and Africa. Never had there been such enormous destruction of life and property among the fighters on land and the civilian populations. On the sea ships were being torpedoed and sunk at a rate which seriously threatened the ship supply of the whole world; 13,000,000 gross tons of shipping, one-fourth of all the commercial vessels on earth, were destroyed before the close of the war. In former wars ships of commerce were captured as prizes, were added to the fleets of the conqueror, and the world at large suffered small loss of tonnage; but the submarines took no prizes, all their victims were sent to the bottom, resulting in complete loss to victor, vanquished, and neutral.

"A few comparisons will illustrate the immensity of this war. In our Civil War between the States the loss of life on both sides was estimated at 200,000, and the cost was $4,750,000,000. In the Franco-Prussian War the loss of life was estimated at 81,000, and the estimated cost was $2,534,000,000. One hundred and twenty-nine thousand seven hundred men were killed in the Russo-Japanese War, and it cost $2,500,000,000. In the present war the estimated loss of troops in battle and those who died of wounds, not including disease, was 7,582,300, and the estimated cost to the belligerents, not including property damage, was $179,000,000,000, of which the United States and its Allies expended about $120,000,000,000, while the Central Powers expended $59,000,000,000. A brief survey of these figures will show how insignificant, in terms of human life and money, were our awful Civil War, the great Franco-Prussian and Russo-Japanese Wars, when compared with the recent mighty conflict.

"What would have happened if America had kept out? Paris would certainly have fallen and the contest been prolonged indefinitely. The chances are that Germany would have won.

"Field Marshal Haig, April 13, 1918, issued a special order to his army in which he said:

"With our backs to the wall, each one of us must fight to the end.

"Lloyd-George in the House of Commons on the 9th of the same month spoke very plainly of the situation, and alluded to the 'splendid and generous way and promptitude with which America has come to our aid.'

"On the 31st of May following the British General Staff said:

"The situation is a very anxious one not only because the Germans have made such rapid progress—an advance of 26 miles in 4 days—but also because they still have such large reserves available to be thrown into the battle at any point.

"Col. Charles Repington, of England, said in the Atlantic Monthly for August last:

"The leadership of your President and the energy and patriotism of your people are exceedingly helpful to us and enable us to regard the future with confidence, in the firm belief that America having set her hand to this giant's task of overthrowing the most dangerous despotism that has ever threatened the world's peace will never turn back or faint by the way until her mission is accomplished.

"Ludendorff, one of the ablest of the German generals, is credited by the press with having said recently that beyond question the Entente Allies would have been defeated but for the aid of America. And this is the general conviction of the American people.

"If Germany had been victorious, free government would have disappeared from Europe for ages, and the effects on free institutions in America and elsewhere would have been very bad, probably ruinous. Germany's system of philosophy idealized the State. Its Government was a great centralized system, under which all were taught from their earliest years to look to the central authority for everything, and that individual rights and aspirations were subordinate to the State in all things. The State had absolute control over education and taught that efficiency was the highest aim of the citizen; that might was right; that the end justified the means; and that the Fatherland must dominate all other nations either by dishonest methods in business or by war.

"Prior to the outbreak of the war in 1914 German ideas of education had a strong hold in many of our schools and higher institutions of learning, and German efficiency, regardless of the means necessary to attain it, had many imitators in America. We were rapidly becoming as godless as Prussia herself. Had the Central Powers won this war and we remained neutral, I greatly fear that German philosophy, coupled with the prestige of her mighty victory and predominating influence throughout the world, would have made the United States a Nation of materialists, forgetful of God, indifferent to the higher things of life, regardless of the rights of other nations, and so addicted to selfishness and luxury that our free national life would have been destroyed just as the Republic of Rome fell 2,000 years ago from the same causes which wrought the awful ruin that has come to Germany and her allies. It is my sincere conviction that we were saved from this fate by entering the war on the side of the Allies and helping to defeat Germany. I believe also that it was essential to our national preservation for us to fight Germany, for had we kept out and the Central Powers won we would soon have been in a death struggle to preserve our very existence as a Republic.

"The world has been sorely chastened, and emerges from this Great War a better world than it was on August 1, 1914. While many horrible crimes were committed by the Central Powers in their lust of pride and strength, and some sins are doubtless chargeable to the soldiers and citizens of our country and its Allies, who were far from perfection, all of us—enemies, friends, and ourselves—have poured out a big holocaust of blood and treasure in expiation. Our sins have been washed away in the blood of 20,000,000 human beings who died as soldiers in battle or from disease and wounds, or as civilians from starvation, exposure, and sickness directly induced by the war.

"Our country was fortunate in possessing such a leader as Woodrow Wilson. He did everything possible to keep us out of the cruel war and withstood the utmost pressure for two years and eight months in futile efforts to maintain our neutrality. Like all men, he makes mistakes, but his ear has heard every heartbeat of the Nation; his finger has felt every pulse; his eye has seen every movement. Nothing affecting the common weal was too small or too large to receive his sympathetic personal attention. He brought to the consideration of all questions a cool, discriminating mind in a healthy body, regulated by just principles and great wisdom. When the story of the war is written by the future historian, after the passions of the day have subsided, among the many great names of this momentous period the highest place by general acclaim of mankind will be accorded to Woodrow Wilson.

"As a Member of the United States Senate it is not becoming in me to praise Congress, but I can not refrain from stating that no Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy since the birth of the Republic ever had more loyal, disinterested support in all his great war measures than were accorded to President Wilson by the vast majority of the Senate and House of Representatives—Democrats and Republicans alike—from the beginning till the armistice was signed. Congress did its full duty and is entitled to proper recognition; and what was Congress but the voice of the American people, the spokesman of our splendid citizenship, who entered this war and prosecuted it with unanimity and one-mindedness, determined to win regardless of cost and at all hazards. Never were our people so thoroughly and completely united, taken as a whole, as in this war. They acted as one man, and all their influence, their energy, their wealth, their fighting power, were concentrated in efforts to win.

"Our people were not actuated by desire of conquest or revenge, or the ordinary selfish motives which usually impel nations to go to war. We fought to maintain free institutions on earth, 'to make the world safe for democracy,' to preserve the freedom of the seas and the right of American vessels to sail unimpeded over all ocean highways, to maintain our national self-respect, and for all things that men hold dear—honor and the good will of other nations and the right to maintain our position as a free, independent people. We do not expect any indemnity for the twenty billions which the war has cost or the 113,000 noble young lives sacrificed to it. We will not accept one foot of German territory nor one dollar of German money. Our blood and are treasure were given to humanity, and our only reward is the knowledge that we did our duty, that we were apostles of liberty and civilization, and that the world at large as well as America will receive incalculable benefits from our efforts.

"The war was conducted with very few serious mistakes—certainly without any of the grave scandals that afflicted the country during our war with Spain 20 years ago. Nothing comparable to the embalmed beef and the pest-ridden camps of that period occurred. On the whole, those charged with the conduct of the war in all its branches—civil and military, at home and abroad—are entitled to the praise and thanks of a grateful Republic.

"In Gen. Pershing's report to Secretary Baker, November 20, 1918, occurs a fine passage, which is applicable not only to the brave soldiers of the line to whom it referred, but to many persons, male and female, in Europe and America and on the high seas, who were true heroes and heroines, many of whom gave their lives for their country. The general says:

"Finally I pay the supreme tribute to our officers and soldiers of the line. When I think of their heroism, their patience under hardships, their unflinching spirit of offensive action, I am filled with emotion which I am unable to express. Their deeds are immortal, and they have earned the eternal gratitude of our country.

"America has had many able generals, some of whom commanded very large armies, but not one of them as great an Army as our leader in this war, Gen. John J. Pershing. He has never become a popular hero, but he is a man of fine qualities; he is our principal military chief in the biggest war of our history, and as such we should honor him.

"One of Pershing's first acts after reaching France was to make a pilgrimage to the grave of Lafayette, and deliver there one of the shortest and most remarkable speeches on record, a speech of just four words, 'Lafayette, we are here,' words so simple yet so full of meaning, words comparable to the 'Veni, vidi, vici' of Julius Cæsar and destined to the same immortality. 'Lafayette, we are here' to cancel the heavy debt of gratitude America owes France for her invaluable service rendered through you and your compatriots in the dark days of our early struggle for liberty. It is 140 years, Lafayette, since you and your country came to our aid when weak and sorely pressed, and during all those years no opportunity has arisen to repay you. At last the chance has come, and we are here, Lafayette—America, with 100,000,000 people and countless wealth, all of which is at your disposal, and before we return home your savage enemy shall be driven from France, your ruthless foe crushed, your lands restored, not only those taken in this war but also the rich Province of Alsace-Lorraine, and full reparation made for all the wrongs done to you.

"One of the most remarkable things in military history was the self-abnegation of Pershing in merging his troops with the English and French divisions, thereby losing their identity. His famous letter of March 28, 1918, to Marshal Foch, says:

"I have come to say to you that the American people would hold it a great honor for our troops were they engaged in the present battle. I ask it of you in my name and in that of the American people.

"Foch accepted the offer, and for several months American troops were mingled in battle with the English and French commands.

"In this connection I wish to say that the greatest single contribution America made to the war was when President Wilson and his advisers induced the Allies, in the face of deep mutterings of discontent in England, to unify their military forces under one commander, and to coordinate their political policies under the direction of a single conference board. It took the combined pressure of the German drive and the Washington initiative to overcome British reluctance to a French generalissimo. The turning of the tide of battle dates from the accession of Foch to the command of the allied armies, March 29, 1918, and to the submission of matters of policy to the interallied conference at Paris. As long as each country—Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and America—had its own general in command of its forces, there was no unity of plan nor concentration of armies to enforce it. The Central Empires were all directed by a German chieftain, and worked together as one man with marvelous success. Placing Foch in supreme command was following the wise example set by our enemies. He was the greatest military genius developed by the war. His leadership was splendid in every way, and he had no more loyal, devoted followers than Gen. Pershing and the soldiers of America.

"War was declared April 6, 1917, and June saw the first units of American combatant troops in France. In the 19 months elapsing from the declaration of war to the signing of the armistice 2,075,834 troops, including marines, were sent over. This was a stupendous accomplishment. In the language of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, 'Nothing to compare with the movement of this tremendous number of men and tons of supplies across the Atlantic Ocean is known in the military history of the world.' Credit for moving the men must be shared with the Allies—the British in particular—but the cargo movement was conducted almost entirely in American ships, less than 5 per cent being carried in allied vessels.

"We had very few ships, and it was necessary to increase our fleet enormously. The inroads of submarines had reached the alarming total of 870,000 tons per month in April, 1917, and their deadly work continued. Lloyd-George begged for 'ships and more ships,' and without ships the war was lost; without ships we could not win. It was up to America to respond, and we responded nobly. Our ship workers suddenly increased from 50,000 to 350,000. We rapidly became a Nation of shipbuilders. The best brain and brawn of the country bent every energy to the task, and vast additions were made before the armistice was signed. A shipyard of 10 ways is a big yard, and yet we built one yard at Hog Island of 50 ways—five very large yards in one—on which 50 great ships were constructed at the same time, by long odds the greatest shipyard in the world, and yet some public men speak of extravagance and waste. Of course there was waste, but the idea of going slowly and carefully experimenting while millions of American boys faced frightful suffering and bloody death—patriotic men have no patience with such criticism.

"This great fleet of commerce carriers was manned by the American Navy, under the lead of its able Secretary, Josephus Daniels, the Navy which has always been the mainstay of the Nation as the first line of defense. While the Navy could not participate in the same sense as the Army, because all the German warships were bottled up and our naval vessels had no chance for action except as convoys to commercial vessels and destroyers of the submarine, its record was memorable. Only 48 vessels were lost during the war—14 by submarines, 5 by mines, 15 by collision incident to the dangers of navigating without lights in submarine-infested waters, and 14 from miscellaneous causes. Since October 1, 1917, there were 289 sailings of naval transports from American ports, and of all this vast movement of ships not one eastbound American transport was torpedoed or damaged by the enemy and only three sunk on the return voyage.

"The greatest single feat of the Navy was laying an antisubmarine barrage across the entire North Sea, a distance of 250 miles from Scotland to Norway. A total of 70,263 mines were laid, of which 56,611 were placed by our Navy and 13,652 by the British—four by us to one by the British. It is known that 10 German submarines were destroyed by this barrage, and its moral effect was far greater than its material, for the barrage was the direct cause of mutiny among the German submarine crews, which led the German Admiralty to abandon its submarine campaign, thereby greatly hastening the end of the war.

"In connection with the Navy, it is proper to mention the marines, who fought so heroically and successfully at Chateau-Thierry, Soissons, Thiancourt, Blanc Mont Ridge, and the Argonne, under the command of Louisiana State University's highest officer, Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, of the parish of Pointe Coupee, who led his class in the university for several years before entering Annapolis. While all America is proud of the marines, Louisiana State University is especially proud of their leader, Gen. Lejeune, and also of every one of her ten hundred and sixty-seven alumni who participated in the war, 29 of whom made the supreme sacrifice on the altar of patriotism.

"What shall I say about that branch of the fighting forces which appeared in this war for the first time in history—service in the air by aeroplane and balloon, which was very important and made almost miraculous advances. A striking instance is helium, a noninflammable gas for balloons, which cost seventeen hundred dollars a cubic foot and was very scarce at the outbreak of the war, but our scientists speedily produced it in quantity at 10 cents a cubic foot.

"An index of American superiority in the air during the later months of the war is shown as follows: Four hundred and eighteen German planes and 53 balloons were destroyed by our fliers, who lost during that period 199 planes and 35 balloons—about two and one-half to our one.

"A shining example of American prowess and fighting spirit is found in the meteoric career of Lieut. Frank Luke, of Phoenix, Ariz., which is fairly comparable to that of Sergt. York, of Tennessee, who captured a machine-gun nest, taking a number of machine guns and 132 prisoners. The sergeant was more fortunate than the lieutenant, for he lived to be acclaimed the greatest hero of the war, and was also victorious in love, as he led his boyhood sweetheart to the altar 10 days ago. Lieut. Luke established the world's record of destroying 18 enemy aircraft in 17 days. In his last flight he attacked a fleet of 10 enemy planes protecting their balloons. Two of the planes were shot down, and in spite of the remaining eight he burned three of their balloons. Seriously wounded, he was compelled to land in the enemy's lines. German soldiers rushed up, to be met with bursts of fire. He killed 11 of them. When at last they took him—dead—his pistol was still held tightly in his hand.

"And what did women do for their country when we went to war? It would be easier to tell what they did not do, for there was no great undertaking where they were not first and foremost.

"The Red Cross set tens of thousands of women to work while war was still afar off, a cloud whose shadow fell on the hearts of women long before it stretched across their hearthstones.

"And when war came to us, what was the first great gift of women? Our Army and Navy; our soldiers and marines; our airplane fliers and fighters. These splendid armies, these fleets of fighting men, were the gift of Columbia's daughters to Columbia when she sent out her call for her children to rally to her defense.

"And then what followed? When the men marched away the women kept up their own work and took up every essential branch of work the men had dropped—in offices and stores, in machine shops, munition factories, street cars, as chauffeurs, farm laborers, dairy women, directing Government bureaus—and in whatever capacity they served the women of this Nation made good. They won for themselves in a few weeks a recognition that centuries of service had failed to bring. Civilization has made long strides in this country in the last four years, and women will find that the unselfish service they have rendered their land in numberless capacities will bring to them a thousandfold return in years to come.

"Speaking of women reminds me that some of our best thinkers believe that the one great outstanding fact of the war was the extraordinary care of the morals of our soldiers in training camps and elsewhere. For the first time in military history the moral welfare of soldiers was jealously safeguarded, and every precaution taken to protect them in that way as well as physically. When our soldiers reached Europe the fine discipline of our home camps was put into effect, and exercised very beneficial influence upon them as well as upon the soldiers of our Allies. The credit for this splendid work is due to the Commission on Training Camp Activities of the War Department, aided and assisted by the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, and the Jewish Welfare Board, all of whom are entitled to the greatest praise.

"Medical science has improved so much in recent years that the total number of deaths from disease among our fighting forces in Europe during the present war—September 1, 1917, to May 2, 1919—was only 49,412, and by far the greatest percentage of these died from pneumonia and influenza. Had the same death rate prevailed as in the Spanish War there would have been 112,656 deaths from disease, and had the Civil War death rate obtained there would have been 227,094 deaths. This vast difference shows a truly remarkable advance and the great number of lives saved thereby. And this in spite of the terrible epidemic of influenza which extended throughout the world and caused the death of millions.

"Another thing very worthy of consideration in this particular is our physical reconstruction work among those injured in battle or otherwise. The results are often marvelous, and many instances can be cited where men very seriously wounded are so thoroughly restored to their normal functions that they enjoy a great degree of comfort and are able to continue as useful, productive members of society.

"If time permitted, I could dwell upon the great success of our selective draft, which mobilized for service every man in America below the age of 45; our marvelous Federal Reserve Bank System, which enabled us to avoid panics and provided ample funds for ourselves and our Allies; the splendid efforts of our farmers, who, under the lead of Herbert Hoover and his able assistants in every State, produced vast additional supplies of food to help feed the starving in Europe; our Government Railway Administration, which 'delivered the goods' after private transportation companies had failed; the various boards and commissions of patriotic men, who labored unselfishly for their country—but all these are matters of history.

"If all things connected with America's participation in the war are considered—its psychological effect in cheering our Allies and disheartening our foes, making the morale of the allied armies nearly perfect and practically destroying that of their enemies; the vast number of men actually engaged in our Army and Navy, upward of 4,000,000 when the armistice was signed, together with the fact, well known to Germany, that 23,709,000 males from 18 to 45 had registered for service under our selective draft; the splendid fighting of our soldiers and marines, starting with Cantigny and ending with the Argonne, and our sailors on the sea with that deadliest of foes, the submarine; the vast supplies of food and war material furnished to our Allies, including nearly nine billions of money loaned to them; the unparalleled record of transporting 2,000,000 soldiers and all things necessary for them over 3,000 miles of submarine-infested sea; the invaluable material and moral aid of every kind contributed by us—the conclusion is incontrovertible that we played a part of supreme importance, if not the determining part, in this momentous struggle.

"We have accomplished our aim. Autocracy has been destroyed in Europe; its people are free; democracy reigns.

"In the process of reconstruction among the new States that grew out of the old Empires of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Russia there will be many discordant elements, hard to fuse into the pure metal of real democracy, but they will ultimately succeed, and we must do all in our power to assist. A strong league of nations will be formed eventually, under the inspiration and leadership of our President, on a workable plan that will assist materially in adjusting national disputes and preventing future wars.

"The millennium is not at hand, and it seems too much to expect universal peace, but an earnest, united effort by every country on earth should be made to attain it, and the United States should lead therein. We gave freedom, prosperity, and happiness to Cuba; and with our aid it rose from its ashes to become a thriving Republic. We have ruled the Philippines with kindly wisdom most helpful to their people and have given them a large measure of self-government preparatory to full independence. Why not act in like manner, so far as differing circumstances permit, toward the struggling young republics of the Old World? To the query, 'Am I my brother's keeper,' we should answer, 'Aye, aye.' Many of our brothers are in sore distress—their young men killed, their houses burned, their food taken away, their farm animals gone, their industry at a standstill—chaos and revolution threatening. It is our duty to help these suffering brethren with counsel, with food, with money, and if need be even with a military force, as we did in the case of Cuba. We are the richest and most powerful Nation on earth. We possess many times 'ten talents,' and will be held to accountability for each one of them. We must not be selfish or contracted. Our vision must reach over all the world, and our good deeds be limited only by the needs of humanity.

"Young friends of the graduating class, I invite you to ponder well the great and noble part enacted by your country in this terrible war. I beg of you to resolve here and now, as you leave the portals of alma mater to follow the devious paths of life, that no word or deed of yours shall call the blush of shame to any honest cheek; that you will, each and every one, do your full duty as citizens of our beloved Republic; and will so live that the martyrs of America and other lands, who gave their lives to free mankind, shall not have died in vain."

JAPANESE CONTROL OF SHANTUNG.

Mr. PHIPPS. I send to the desk a letter received from Edward T. Lazear, of Fruita, Colo., protesting against the clause contained in the treaty of peace with Germany in regard to control of Shantung by Japan, and request that it be read by the Secretary and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the letter was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

FRUITA, COLO., July 5, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having lived in Shantung, China, at different places on the old German railroad, from 1913 to 1917, I feel that I am somewhat qualified to make a protest against the decision of the peace commission in giving Shantung to the Japanese. This is as great a calamity as could possibly befall our sister Republic. That great nation so badly in need of foreign counsel and help has been sold to the Japanese by a few unscrupulous officials in Peking; and now our own President declares himself in favor of giving to the Japanese legally the very thing that the grafting Judas Iscariots of Peking sold to the Japs for money. Any man who has lived in that Province, even for a short time, can not but feel very deeply about this outrage which we are liable to commit.

I lived at Wainsien on the German railroad, halfway between the two terminals, during the autumn that the Japanese attacked Tsingtau; and I was in Tsingtau a few weeks after the surrender. I have therefore seen the Japanese as they really are. I saw the Japanese Army march across the Province, violating all laws of neutrality and doing nothing different from the Huns in their march through Belgium. They levied taxes on all towns which they went through, lived off the Chinese, helped themselves liberally to live stock and property of all kinds, and killed objectors outright. The wells were polluted for months by the bodies of women and children who chose that death rather than subject themselves to the cruel mercies of the invading army. The military took over the Chinese post offices in the whole locality and censored all first-class United States mail matter. For months all the letters I wrote to this country dropped in a Chinese post office with Chinese postage stamps thereon arrived in America with Japanese stamps. A friend of mine who wrote to this country protesting against the treatment that the Chinese were receiving at the hands of the Japs and who mailed his letter in a Chinese post office was notified by the Japanese that he could no longer use the mails. And, true enough, every letter he thereafter mailed was returned to him opened. The Japanese are identical with the Germans in thought and action; for have they not modeled their military system after that of the Huns and molded the German character into their own? If given control of Shantung they would govern it no different from the manner the Germans would have governed us had they conquered us in this war.

During the rebellion of 1915 I saw with my own eyes bands of Chinese rebels led by Japanese officers fighting the Government troops. The rebels were supplied with Japanese ammunition, and had practically carte blanche use of the railroad. On several occasions the rebels fired on the compound in which I lived; and in every case, on the following morning, Japanese officers called and asked us if we did not wish to place ourselves under their protection. If we had done so, the press would have announced to the world that the Japanese were the saviors of the American people in Shantung.

If the Japanese are allowed possession of Shantung it will not be long before the whole nation is absorbed. The Japanese are no more fit to rule the Chinese than a South Sea Islander is. Why, because a few officials in Peking sell their country, should we make a decision to let 40,000,000 people—and eventually 400,000,000 people—come under the domination of the Yellow Hun?

I trust that you will use your influence to have this clause struck from the treaty.

Very truly, yours,

EDWARD T. LAZEAR.

TREATY-MAKING POWER.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the year 1913 the junior Senator from the State of Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was president of the American Bar Association, and delivered an address at the annual meeting of that association upon the treaty-making power of the Government. The document is particularly valuable for the information of Senators at this time, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, FRANK B. KELLOGG, OF MINNESOTA.

(Presented at the meeting of the American Bar Association, at Montreal, Canada, Sept. 1–3, 1913.)

TREATY-MAKING POWER.

"Gentlemen of the American Bar Association, this is the first meeting of the American Bar Association outside of the United States. Though we meet in a foreign country, we do so among a people allied to us by every tie that binds nations in a common brotherhood. We are of the same race, speaking the same language, governed by the same general principles of law, inspired by the same traditions, working out as separate nations the same great destiny. I hope that the peace which has so long existed between these peoples may be further cemented, and mutual and friendly intercourse continue to increase. On behalf of the American Bar Association, I welcome this opportunity to extend to the officials and lawyers of the Dominion of Canada our sincere thanks for the great assistance they have rendered toward making this a memorable meeting of our association.

"The constitution of the American Bar Association requires the president in his annual address to review notable changes in statute law. Ordinarily this subject is rather dry and of little interest to the lawyers of other countries; yet at times these enactments of Congress or of the legislatures of the States touch upon subjects of absorbing general interest. The statute which has attracted the most attention, stimulated the widest discussion, and raised questions of the most far-reaching and momentous consequences to the Nation and its relations with foreign powers is the alien land law of California. This statute, which became a law on May 19, 1913, permits aliens eligible to citizenship to possess, enjoy, transmit, and inherit real property in the same manner as citizens. Aliens not eligible to citizenship may acquire, possess, enjoy, and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in the manner and to the extent permitted by any treaty existing between the Government of the United States and the nation of which such alien is a citizen, and not otherwise. In other words, such an alien, if not permitted by treaty, may not own, transmit, or inherit real property in the State of California, and such property if held in violation of the act is subject to confiscation to the State. Section 7 of the act provides: 'Nothing in this act shall be construed as a limitation upon the power of the State to enact laws with respect to the acquisition, holding, or disposal by aliens of real property in this State.'

"The treaty with Japan of 1911 provided that 'the citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established.'

"The question raised, which has received such wide discussion by publicists and journalists, is whether a State may, in violation of a treaty between the United States and a foreign power, regulate the ownership of real estate within its borders by citizens of such foreign country.

"I shall not stop to discuss the question of whether the treaty with Japan does give to her citizens within the United States the right to own real estate. It gives them the right to carry on trade, to own houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops, and to lease land for residential and commercial purposes. If citizens of Japan have any right to own real estate in California, it is difficult to see how this law takes away such right, because it provides in substance that such aliens may acquire, possess, enjoy, and transfer real estate in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty.

"But the question has been squarely raised by the declaration of the Legislature of California which was intended and understood by the public generally to mean that California claimed such right notwithstanding any treaty provisions with the Federal Government.

"Arizona has adopted an alien land law more drastic than that of California; but this likewise provides that it shall not be so construed as to conflict in any manner with any treaty of the United States.

"In Washington a constitutional amendment has been submitted to the people providing in substance that if a resident alien becomes a nonresident for nine years his real property shall be vested in the common-school fund.

"The laws of these latter States have not attracted attention, but the passage of this law by the Legislature of California and the public discussion which followed have raised a question which may disturb the amicable relations heretofore existing between the United States and Japan—a question of vital importance to our Nation in its relation with foreign governments.

"I am convinced that there can be no serious doubt that the Federal Government may, by treaty, define the status of a foreign citizen within the States, the places where he may travel, the business in which he may engage, the property he may own, both real and personal, and the devolution of such property upon his death; that such a treaty constitutes the supreme law of the land; and that a State law contravening such a treaty is void and will be so declared by the courts in a suitable action.

"These propositions have been established by the laws and usages of all civilized nations, by the history of the times, by the opinions of the statesmen who framed our Constitution, by the provisions of the Constitution, by the universal practice of making such treaties from the days of the Confederation, and, lastly, by the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of many other courts during a period of more than 100 years. And yet, notwithstanding this array of authority, when the question arose, the Legislature of California, by an almost unanimous vote of its members and with the approval of its distinguished governor, took the position that California had the exclusive right to regulate the ownership and disposition of real estate by foreign citizens—a position which was conceded without question by a large section of the public journals and which seems to have been held by influential Members of the Washington Government. Certain it is that the Government did not take the stand that any law of California or any other State made in violation of a treaty with the United States is void, and that the Government would enforce such treaty rights notwithstanding the action of the States.

"From the standpoint of history and judicial authority, I shall attempt in this address to maintain the supremacy of the treaty-making power, although the subject has been so fully treated by able writers and in judicial opinions that it seems hardly to be open to discussion.

"The Federal Government is a Government of the people and not of the States. Its title springs from the primary authority of all governmental power and its treaty-making power is subject to no limitations except those provided by the Constitution.

"The provisions of the Constitution of the United States relative to the treaty-making power and the limitations upon the States are as follows:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." Article I, section 10, clause 1.

"No State shall without the consent of Congress enter into any agreement or compact with any State or with a foreign power." Article I, section 10, clause 2.

"He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Article II, section 2, clause 2.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." Article III, section 2, clause 1.

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution of laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Article VI, clause 2.

"If there were no authority to the contrary, it would hardly be presumed that the people of the United States intended to confer upon the Federal Government a less power than had been exercised by other nations since the dawn of civilization. It has been the practice of governments, through the treaty-making power, to fix the status of foreign citizens, their right to engage in business, and to own, transfer, and inherit property. It is one of the indubitable prerogatives of sovereignty.

"The exercise of the treaty-making power has rarely been left to the individual States collectively constituting a nation, nor have such States usually been permitted to pass laws violating such treaties. Few individual States in confederations have retained the treaty-making power. Notable examples of these were the Greek, the Swiss, the North German, and the Netherlands confederations. The Greek republics perished. The other three governments, finding the loose confederations disastrous to national unity and prosperity, changed their forms of government, so that the treaty-making power is now vested in the nation.

"The statesmen of the latter part of the eighteenth century who participated in framing the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of the United States were deep students of history; they were familiar with the examples and failures of certain of these confederacies; and the debates in the Continental Congress, in the Constitutional Convention, and in the conventions of the various States considering the adoption of the Constitution illustrate with remarkable clearness that it was the intention, by the adoption of the Constitution, to place the treaty-making power solely in the Federal Government, to make that power comprehensive, including all the subjects upon which it had been the custom of nations to treat, to make the treaties the supreme law of the land, and to create a Federal judiciary and an executive with powers adequate to enforce the obligations imposed upon the nation by its treaties. These men knew exactly what they were doing. They disagreed upon the wisdom of giving such power to the Federal Government, but they did not disagree as to the extent of the power they were conferring. They had seen the defects of the confederation, the want of power to enforce treaties, and the evils resulting therefrom, and they undertook, by the adoption of the Constitution, to remedy those evils.

"Let me now invite your attention for a few moments to the treaty-making power conferred upon the Federal Government by the Articles of Confederation and the disastrous results flowing from the want of authority to enforce its treaties. By the Articles of Confederation of 1778 it was provided that 'no State, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with any king, prince, or State.' (Art. 6.)

"'The United States, in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war * * * of sending and receiving ambassadors, entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts or duties on foreigners as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever.' (Art. 9.)

"Under this article the Congress of the Confederation entered into treaties with foreign governments defining the status of foreign citizens within the several States, and their right to engage in business, and to own, dispose of, and inherit property, both real and personal. Such treaties were made with France, the Netherlands, Sweden, Great Britain, Morocco, and Prussia. (Treaty with France, Feb. 6, 1778, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 12; treaty with the States General of United Netherlands, Oct. 8, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 32; treaty of peace with Great Britain, Nov. 30, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 54; treaty with Sweden, Apr. 3, 1783, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 60; treaty with Prussia, September, 1785, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 84; treaty with Morocco, Jan. 7, 1787, 8 U. S. Stat. L. 100.)

"The right of the Confederated Government to enter into these treaties was apparently never questioned until after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, when the provisions of such treaties guaranteeing the rights of foreign citizens were sustained under Article VI, clause 2, of the Constitution making treaties then existing, or which might thereafter be made, the supreme law of the land. These subjects were not matters over which the Congress ordinarily had jurisdiction, but were matters which came within the jurisdiction of the States, both under the confederation and under the Constitution; yet they were matters clearly within the treaty-making power. Can it be possible that, at the very threshold of this fabric of Federal Government, the men who had established it, who were familiar with its powers and with the power of governments generally to make treaties, made these treaties with the full knowledge that the Congress had no power to make a treaty over any matter which in ordinary domestic affairs was within the regulative power of the State? If it be true that the Federal Government may not make a treaty upon any matter which is ordinarily reserved for the governmental control of the State, a principal part of the treaty-making power, as it has been exercised for more than 125 years, is swept away, for the central Government has exercised this power, and it is absolutely necessary that it should do so in order to protect foreign citizens in their rights and to demand and receive for our citizens the same rights in foreign countries. We can not expect that American citizens will be respected and receive the protection to which they are entitled under the principles of international law and the custom of nations if we declare that our Government is so impotent that it can not give to foreign citizens within the States the same protection.

"But let us consider this subject from the position of authority. When the convention which was to frame the Constitution met in 1787, it was confronted with one of the most difficult tasks which has ever fallen to the lot of a deliberative body. The confederation, like all confederations which have come and gone, was inadequate for national purposes. It could not raise money, enforce its laws, prevent the violation of its treaties by the States, or protect interstate and foreign commerce. The history of the times and the constitutional debates show that one of the most vital defects in this confederation was the want of power to enforce treaties. No one doubted the power of the Government to make them, for the only limitations upon the treaty-making power in the Articles of Confederation were in respect to imposing duties and restraining the Congress from prohibiting by treaty the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities. Even those limitations were removed under the Constitution subsequently adopted. But the trouble at that time was that the Confederate Government was a government of the States and not of the people. It acted upon and through the State governments rather than directly upon the people. There were no Federal courts or executive officers to enforce the treaties. Their enforcement was left to the States, which either obeyed them or not as their selfish interests seemed at the time to dictate. There was no provision in the Articles of Confederation making the treaties superior to the laws of the States. These very property rights which I have heretofore enumerated, guaranteed to foreign citizens by the treaties, had been violated by the States. Real and personal property and debts owing them had been confiscated, and the courts had refused to enforce the treaty obligations. Especially was this true of the treaty with Great Britain of September 3, 1783, which, among other things, provided that creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bona fide debts theretofore contracted; that all persons who had any interest in confiscated lands, either by debts, marriage settlements, or otherwise, should meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights, and that there should be no further confiscations made nor any prosecutions commenced against any person by reason of the part which he may have taken in the war, nor on that account should any person suffer any loss or damage either in his person or property. The violation of these guaranties by the State and the inability of the Federal Government to enforce them, through want of the court machinery and executive power, had greatly disturbed the public mind and made a deep impression upon the statesmen and publicists of that day, both in our country and in foreign countries, and it was one of the controlling reasons for calling the Constitutional Convention.

"Time does not permit me to cite the numerous authorities establishing beyond question the opinions of public men at this time and their determination to correct this, one of the greatest defects of the Confederation. These opinions were held by substantially all of the leading men: Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, Randolph, Pinckney, Adams, Wilson, and others.

"There is no question about the determination of the great majority of the convention to place the exclusive right of making treaties in the Federal Government and to confer on that Government the power to enforce their provisions through the machinery of the Federal Government exclusive of the States. Every proposition to limit this power was voted down, and there was evidenced the greatest solicitude for the adoption of adequate means for the enforcement of treaty stipulations. It was first proposed to vest the treaty-making power in the Senate, but afterwards it was vested in the President, by and with the approval of the Senate, two-thirds of its Members present voting therefor.

"But the most important thing was to adopt means whereby the acts of the States in violation of treaties could be annulled. Various plans were discussed. The sixth resolution offered by Gov. Randolph proposed to give Congress the right 'to negative all laws passed by the several States contravening, in the opinion of the National Legislature, the articles of Union.' (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 144). This, in substance, was contained in Pinckney's first draft of the Constitution. It was, however, considered by the convention cumbersome and inadequate. It would require the Congress to affirmatively act upon and set aside each legislative or constitutional provision of the States violating our treaties instead of declaring and making them invalid and creating a department of the Government to enforce the treaty stipulations. This point is made very clear by the debates in the Constitutional Convention.

"Speaking upon the Paterson resolutions, Mr. Madison expressed the opinion that they did not go far enough in the general surrender of power to the Central Government. He said (Butler's Treaty-Making Power, vol. 1, sec. 177):

"Will it prevent the violations of the law of nations and of treaties which, if not prevented, must involve us in the calamities of foreign wars? The tendency of the States to these violations has been manifested in sundry instances. The files of Congress contain complaints already from almost every nation with which treaties have been formed. Hitherto indulgence has been shown us. This can not be the permanent disposition of foreign nations. A rupture with other powers is the greatest of calamities. It ought, therefore, to be effectually provided that no part of a nation shall have it in its power to bring them on the whole. The existing Confederacy does not sufficiently provide against this evil. The proposed amendment to it does not supply the omission. It leaves the will of the States as uncontrolled as ever.

"Paterson had proposed a resolution creating a Federal judiciary with jurisdiction in all cases 'in which foreigners may be interested in the construction of any treaty or treaties' and making such treaties the supreme law of the respective States in the following language (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 177):

"Resolved, That all acts of the United States in Congress assembled, made by virtue and in pursuance of the powers hereby vested in them, and by the Articles of Confederation, and all treaties made and ratified under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the respective States as far as those acts or treaties shall relate to the said States or their citizens; and that the judiciaries of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions, anything in the respective laws of the individual States to the contrary notwithstanding.

"And if any State, or any body of men in any State, shall oppose or prevent the carrying into execution such acts or treaties, the Federal Executive shall be authorized to call forth the powers of the Confederated States, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enforce and compel an obedience to such acts or an observance of such treaties.

"This was the basis of Luther Martin's resolution (Butler's Treaty-Making Power, vol. 1, sec. 181), which was finally adopted, with some modification, as Article VI of the Constitution. A Federal judiciary was created consisting of one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress might from time to time ordain and establish, and the judicial power was extended to all cases arising under the Constitution and treaties made.

"Thus it will be seen that under this constitutional provision any constitution or law of a State in violation of a treaty was made void and the State judges were bound so to declare, and a Federal judiciary was created having jurisdiction over all questions arising under such treaty, with full power and authority to enforce its decrees. The Federal convention had accomplished its purpose to correct one of the greatest weaknesses of the confederated Government. It adopted these provisions in the light of the usage of nations, the history of the times, and with full knowledge of the evil to be remedied. While men differed as to the wisdom of this central power, none differed as to its nature. It was deliberately adopted in order that we might be a Nation and fulfill our obligations to foreign powers.

"In the various State conventions called for the ratification of the Constitution the meaning of these provisions was not doubted; only their wisdom was questioned. It was claimed that too great a power was conferred upon the President and the Senate; if treaties were to be the supreme law of the land, the House of Representatives ought to have a voice in making them; they ought not to be made so as to alter the constitution or the laws of any State, and a resolution to this effect was proposed in the New York convention by Mr. Lansing. Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention, was particularly strenuous in his opposition to the treaty-making power and the supremacy of the treaties over the laws and constitutions of the States. He stated (Butler's Treaty-Making Power, vol. 1, sec. 216):

"Treaties rest on the laws and usages of nations. To say that they are municipal is to me a doctrine totally novel. To make them paramount to the constitution and laws of the States is unprecedented. * * *

"We are told that the State rights are preserved. Suppose the State right to territory be preserved, I ask and demand, How do the rights of persons stand when they have power to make any treaty and that treaty is paramount to constitutions, laws, and everything?

"Mr. Madison, speaking in the Virginia convention, said:

"The confederation is so notoriously feeble that foreign nations are unwilling to form any treaties with us; they are apprised that our General Government can not perform any of its engagements, but that they may be violated at pleasure by any of the States. Our violation of treaties already entered into proves this truth unequivocally.

"The most remarkable discussion of the Constitution was by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, in the Federalist, a discussion which excited the admiration of statesmen the world over and compares favorably with the writings of such great students of government as Vattel, Montesquieu, Burke, Machiavelli, and Rousseau.

"In the twenty-second number of the Federalist Hamilton discusses the defects of the confederation in its want of power to enforce treaties in the several States. He said:

"A circumstance which crowns the defects of the confederation remains yet to be mentioned—the want of a judiciary power. Laws are a dead letter without courts to expound and define their true meaning and operation. The treaties of the United States, to have any force at all, must be considered as part of the law of the land. Their true import, as far as respects individuals, must, like all other laws, be ascertained by judicial determinations. To produce uniformity in these determinations, they ought to be submitted in the last resort to one supreme tribunal. And this tribunal ought to be instituted under the same authority which forms the treaties themselves. These ingredients are both indispensable. If there is in each State a court of final jurisdiction, there may be as many different final determinations on the same point as there are courts. There are endless diversities in the opinions of men. We often see not only different courts but the judges of the same court differing from each other. To avoid the confusion which would unavoidably result from the contradictory decisions of a number of independent judicatories, all nations have found it necessary to establish one court paramount to the rest, possessing a general superintendence, and authorized to settle and declare in the last resort a uniform rule of civil justice. * * *

"The treaties of the United States, under the present Constitution, are liable to the infractions of 13 different legislatures, and as many different courts of final jurisdiction, acting under the authority of those legislatures. The faith, the reputation, the peace of the whole Union, are thus continually at the mercy of the prejudices, the passions, and the interests of every member of which it is composed. Is it possible that foreign nations can either respect or confide in such a government? Is it possible that the people of America will longer consent to trust their honor, their happiness, their safety, on so precarious a foundation?

"In discussing the subject of limitations upon the power of the Federal Government he says that such power 'ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee or define the extent and variety of national exigencies, or the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them.'

"It was in the light of history and with the full knowledge of the condition of the treaty-making power and of the violation of treaties by the States that the Constitution was adopted by the convention of every State after the widest discussion and deliberate consideration. It was a momentous step in human government. It was to be a trial of constitutional representative democracy. While preserving the widest field consistent with liberty in the individual, it was an attempt to confer upon the central government sufficient power to stand among the nations of the earth. It attempted to remedy the evils and instabilities of pure democracies and loose confederations on the one hand, and the oppressions and tyrannies of pure monarchies on the other. While protecting the person and the property of the citizen against the abuses of government, it gave to the central government the power to make treaties with foreign nations necessary to the preservation of the Union, to the extension of its commerce, to the protection of its citizens in foreign lands, and the right reciprocally to confer upon foreign citizens those privileges consistent with the laws and usages of nations; and, lastly, it established a tribunal—the Federal judiciary—which was to preserve the constitutional guaranties of liberty, maintain the supremacy of the Union, and enforce its laws and treaties.

"We come now to the last and conclusive interpretation of the treaty-making power by the Supreme Court of the United States. We shall see how citizens of foreign countries, whose rights, guaranteed by treaties with the central government, had been violated by the States, naturally sought redress in the tribunal the Constitution created for this purpose, and how that court, fully realizing its grave responsibility, established beyond peradventure the supremacy of the treaties over the laws of the States and enforced the rights of foreign citizens, in the face of popular prejudice. These decisions were rendered at a time when the reasons for the adoption of the constitutional provisions were fresh in the minds of lawyers and jurists. Many of the men who participated in these trials and in the decisions as judges had been members of the Constitutional Convention and of the Congress of the Confederation. They knew the reasons which had actuated the convention in adopting these provisions and the construction which ought to be placed upon them; and by an unbroken line of decisions, evincing the most profound knowledge of the principles underlying representative government, the court sustained the supremacy of the treaty-making power in relation to the subjects under discussion.

"Alexander Hamilton was the first to assert the rights of British subjects to lands in the State of New York, claiming that they were protected by the treaty, notwithstanding the confiscatory legislation of that State. He argued the case of Elizabeth Rutgers v. Joshua Waddington in the mayor's court of the city of New York, in 1784. The decision in that case, which sustained the treaty as against the law of the State of New York, brought forth a storm of protest and created the most bitter feeling. It was denounced in mass meetings of the people, and an extra session of the legislature condemned the action of the court. Hamilton was publicly abused, and his motives questioned. But with commendable courage and with masterly ability he defended the treaty-making power and denounced the violations of the treaties by the several States. He published a series of letters under the name of Phocion, in which he clearly set forth the injustice to foreign citizens, their rights under the treaties, and the danger to the Government from these flagrant violations by the States. These letters created a powerful impression upon the public mind and contributed in no small degree to the action in the Constitutional Convention to guard against a possibility of such abuses in the future.

"The first reported case on the subject in the Supreme Court of the United States is the case of Ware v. Hylton (3 Dallas, 199). It was in substance provided by a law of the Commonwealth of Virginia that a citizen of Virginia owing money to a subject of Great Britain might pay the same to the State of Virginia, and that the receipt of the governor and council should be a discharge from such debt. The law required the governor and the council to lay before the general assembly an accounting of these certificates of payment, and provided that they should see to the safe-keeping of the money subject to the future directions of the legislature. A British subject sued a citizen of Virginia upon a debt. The defendant pleaded the law of Virginia and the payment to the State. The plaintiff replied setting up the fourth article of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States. The court held that the treaty was the supreme law of the land, and repealed all provisions of the State laws and constitution to the contrary. There were opinions by Justices Chase, Paterson, Wilson, and Cushing. Justice Chase said (3 Dallas, 236–237):

"There can be no limitation on the power of the people of the United States. By their authority the State constitutions were made, and by their authority the Constitution of the United States was established; and they had the power to change or abolish the State constitutions, or to make them yield to the General Government, and to treaties made by their authority. A treaty can not be the supreme law of the land—that is, of all the United States—if any act of a State legislature can stand in its way. If the constitution of a State (which is the fundamental law of the State, and paramount to its legislature) must give way to a treaty and fall before it, can it be questioned whether the less power, an act of the State legislature, must not be prostrate? It is the declared will of the people of the United States that every treaty made by the authority of the United States shall be superior to the constitution and laws of any individual State, and their will alone is to decide. If a law of a State, contrary to a treaty, is not void, but voidable only by a repeal or nullification by a State legislature, this certain consequence follows, that the will of a small part of the United States may control or defeat the will of the whole. The people of America have been pleased to declare that all treaties made before the establishment of the National Constitution, or laws of any of the States, contrary to a treaty, shall be disregarded.

"It will be remembered that the fourth article of the treaty provided that creditors on either side 'shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted.' Speaking specially of this provision, Justice Chase said:

"* * * The only impediment to the recovery of the debt in question is the law of Virginia and the payment under it; and the treaty relates to every kind of legal impediment.

"But it is asked, did the fourth article intend to annul a law of the States and destroy rights acquired under it?

"I answer that the fourth article did intend to destroy all lawful impediments, past and future; and that the law of Virginia and the payment under it is a lawful impediment, and would bar a recovery, if not destroyed by this article of the treaty.

"* * * Our Federal Constitution establishes the power of a treaty over the constitution and laws of any of the States, and I have shown that the words of the fourth article were intended and are sufficient to nullify the law of Virginia and the payment under it.

"Justice Paterson said:

"The fourth article embraces all creditors, extends to all preexisting debts, removes all lawful impediments, repeals the legislative act of Virginia which has been pleaded in bar, and with regard to the creditor annuls everything done under it.

"Justice Wilson said:

"Even if Virginia had the power to confiscate, the treaty annuls the confiscation. The fourth article is well expressed to meet the very case; it is not confined to debts existing at the time of making the treaty; but is extended to debts heretofore contracted. It is impossible by any glossary or argument to make the words more perspicuous, more conclusive, than by a bare recital. Independent, therefore, of the Constitution of the United States, which authoritatively inculcates the obligation of contracts the treaty is sufficient to remove every impediment founded on the law of Virginia.

"Justice Cushing said:

"A State may make what rules it pleases, and those rules must necessarily have place within itself. But here is a treaty, the supreme law, which overrules all State laws upon the subject, to all intents and purposes; and that makes the difference.

"* * * To effect the object intended, there is no want of proper and strong language; there is no want of power, the treaty being sanctioned as the supreme law, by the Constitution of the United States, which nobody pretends to deny to be paramount and controlling to all State laws, and even State constitutions, wheresoever they interfere or disagree. The treaty, then, as to the point in question, is of equal force with the constitution itself; and certainly, with any law whatsoever.

"Both Justices Paterson and Wilson had been members of the Constitutional Convention. Justice Wilson had been a member of the Congress and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and was one of the most distinguished lawyers of the United States. The Chief Justice was one of the authors of the Federalist. They were all men deeply learned as lawyers and statesmen. This opinion was delivered in the February term, 1796. It was the leading case which for the first time laid down the principles of the supremacy of the Federal treaties over State laws. It was argued by distinguished counsel, Marshall, subsequently Chief Justice, appearing for the defendants in opposition to the treaty power. It received the most careful and painstaking consideration by the court. It was followed by many decisions all along the same line, some of them particularly applying to the ownership or the devolution of real estate within the States.

"In the case of Chirac v. Chirac (2 Wheat., 259), decided at the February term in 1817, Chief Justice Marshall wrote the opinion. The question involved was whether the heirs of Chirac, being aliens, might inherit property in Maryland, according to the terms of the treaty with France, although in violation of the antialien law of that State. Chief Justice Marshall said (2 Wheat., 271):

"It is unnecessary to inquire into the consequences of this state of things, because we are all of opinion that the treaty between the United States and France, ratified in 1778, enabled the subjects of France to hold lands in the United States. That treaty declared that 'The subjects and inhabitants of the United States, or any one of them, shall not be reputed Aubains (that is aliens) in France.' 'They may, by testament, donation, or otherwise, dispose of their goods, movable and immovable, in favor of such persons as to them shall seem good; and their heirs, subjects of the said United States, whether residing in France or elsewhere, may succeed them ab intestat, without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization. The subjects of the most Christian King shall enjoy, on their part, in all the dominions of the said States, an entire and perfect reciprocity relative to the stipulations contained in the present article.'

"Upon every principle of fair construction this article gave to the subjects of France a right to purchase and hold lands in the United States.

"It is unnecessary to inquire into the effect of this treaty under the confederation, because, before John Baptiste Chirac emigrated to the United States, the confederation had yielded to our present Constitution, and this treaty had become the supreme law of the land.

"In Orr v. Hodgson (4 Wheat., 453) it was held that the treaty with Great Britain of 1783 protected the estates of citizens of that country from forfeiture by way of escheat for the defect of alienage.

"In the case of Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee (7 Cranch, 603) Justice Story, writing the opinion, held that the heir of Lord Fairfax, although being an alien, was protected by the treaty of 1794 from any forfeiture for alienage under the laws of Virginia.

"In Hughes v. Edwards (9 Wheat., 489) the Supreme Court held, Justice Washington writing the opinion, that although under the laws of Kentucky aliens could not hold lands therein or maintain a bill to foreclose a mortgage thereon, yet, under the treaty of Great Britain of 1794, British subjects who then held lands in the territories of the United States were guaranteed the right to continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates; that this was the supreme law of the land, and superior to and rendered void the law of Kentucky to the contrary.

"There were several other decisions to the same effect by the Supreme Court during the first quarter century of the existence of the Government. Coming down to a later period we find that those decisions have been reaffirmed and approved.

"In 1879 the Supreme Court decided the case of Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S., 483–487), Justice Swayne delivering the opinion. Solomon Hauenstein died in the city of Richmond in 1861 or 1862, without any children, leaving real estate therein. An inquisition of escheat was brought by the escheator for that district, and when he was about to sell the property the plaintiff in error, being an alien and the only heir of Hauenstein, intervened and claimed the real estate. It was clear that under the laws of Virginia aliens were incapable of taking property by inheritance. The court held that ordinarily the law of nations recognizes the liberty of every government to give to foreigners only such rights touching immovable property within its territory as it may see fit to concede, and that in this country this authority is primarily in the State where the property is situated, but that where the Federal Government has contracted otherwise such treaty is the supreme law of the land and will be enforced by the courts. The court reviewed Ware v. Hylton, Chirac v. Chirac, Hughes v. Edwards, Orr v. Hodgson, the case of the heirs of Lord Fairfax, and other cases. In conclusion, Justice Swayne said:

"We have no doubt that this treaty is within the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution, and it is our duty to give it full effect.

"These cases were again reviewed and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in 1889, in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 263), Justice Field writing the opinion. The court in that case held that under the treaty with France a citizen of that country was entitled to take real estate by descent in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding the law of Maryland, which had been adopted by Congress as the law of the District. The court held that the treaty power of the United States under the Constitution extended to the subject of the ownership of land by foreign citizens within the States. Justice Field said (133 U. S., 266–267):

"That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the Governments of other nations is clear. It is also clear that the protection which should be afforded to the citizens of one country owning property in another, and the manner in which that property may be transferred, devised, or inherited, are fitting subjects for such negotiation and of regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries. As commercial intercourse increases between different countries the residence of citizens of one country within the territory of the other naturally follows, and the removal of their disability from alienage to hold, transfer, and inherit property in such cases tends to promote amicable relations. Such removal has been within the present century the frequent subject of treaty arrangement.

"* * * In adopting it (the law of Maryland) as it then existed, it adopted the law with its provisions suspended during the continuance of the treaty so far as they conflicted with it; in other words, the treaty, being part of the supreme law of the land, controlled the statute and common land of Maryland whenever it differed from them.

"I shall not attempt to review the decisions of the various Federal circuit courts, except to say that Judge Deady (Baker v. City of Portland, 5 Sawyer, 566), of the United States Circuit Court in Oregon, held that a statute of that State prohibiting the employment of Chinese labor on public works was in violation of the treaty between the United States and China; that Judges Sawyer and Hoffman (In re Tiburcio Parrott, 6 Sawyer, 349), in the United States Circuit Court in California, held that the constitutional provision of that State prohibiting corporations within the State from employing Chinese labor was in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1868 with China; that Judge Munger (Bahuaud v. Bize, 105 Fed. Rep., 485), in a late decision in Nebraska held that the treaty of 1853 between the United States and France permitted resident aliens of that country to own real estate in Nebraska, and that the statute of Nebraska to the contrary was void. Nor shall I attempt to review the decisions of the State courts. Many of them have held, following the early decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the provisions of the treaties guaranteeing rights to hold and inherit real estate, giving consular agents the right to administer upon the estates of deceased, and other like provisions, were binding upon the States, notwithstanding the laws thereof. California, I believe, is the only State holding to the contrary. (Tellefesen v. Fee, 168 Mass., 188; Louisiana Succession of Ravasse, 47 La. Ann., 1452; Stixrud v. Washington, 58 Wash., 339, 109 Pac., 343, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.), 632; Dufour's Succession, 10 La. Ann., 391; Amat's Succession, 18 La. Ann., 403; Crusius's Succession, 19 La. Ann., 369; Rixner's Succession, 48 La. Ann., 552, 32 L. R. A., 177, 19 So., 597; Prevost v. Greneaux, 19 How., 1; Wunderle v. Wunderle, 33 N. E., 195; Lehman v. Miller (Ind.), 88 N. E., 365; Dockstader v. Roe (Del.), 55 Atl., 341; Yeaker v. Yeaker, 4 Met. (Ky.), 33; Opel v. Shoup, 100 Iowa, 407, 37 L. R. A., 583, 69 N. W., 560.)

"There are certain expressions in some decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in opinions of Chief Justice Taney, delivered in 1840 (Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet., 540), of Justice Daniel, shortly after, in the License Cases (5 How., 504), and of Chief Justice Taney and Justice Grier in the Passenger Cases (7 How., 283), tending to support the theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to the subjects which by the Constitution are ordinarily committed to the regulative jurisdiction of the States. In all of these cases there were opinions by several of the justices of the court, and it does not appear that the language used was approved by the majority. In fact, in the Passenger Cases the language of Chief Justice Taney was used in a dissenting opinion. These decisions, however, do not purport to overrule the earlier decisions of the court to the contrary and have never been followed by the court since that time. They were rendered at a time, now happily past, when the country was divided by an overwhelming issue which darkened the political sky and clouded the judgments of men. This undoubtedly had its effect upon the decisions of that great court, but the later decisions have placed at rest whatever doubt may have existed.

"The Constitution confers upon the Federal Government, in unqualified terms, the power to make treaties and prohibits the States from making any treaty with foreign States. What reason is there for saying that the treaty-making power is confined to matters which under the Constitution Congress may legislate upon, or that such treaties may not touch upon any subject which, as between Congress and the State governments, in ordinary matters is reserved to the latter? Take, for instance, the question of commerce. There is an interstate and international commerce, the exclusive regulation of which is in Congress. There is an intrastate commerce which is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States. And yet, even as to the regulation of interstate commerce, the Supreme Court has held that there are no limits except those imposed by the Constitution of the United States; and if the regulations of Congress made pursuant to this plenary power conflict with those of the States, the law of Congress is supreme and the State laws must give way. In regard to the matter of treaties there is no division of power. None of it is reserved to the States. Unless, therefore, the Federal Government may make a treaty regulating the activities of foreign citizens in the States, no regulation can take place, for the States may not make such a treaty and Congress may not legislate upon the subject. Congress does not obtain its right to legislate upon the subject through any other provision of the Constitution than under the treaty-making power. As well might it be said that because the States have power to regulate domestic commerce the General Government could not make a treaty giving foreign citizens the right to travel on the intrastate railways or make use of any of the other conveniences of modern civilization necessary to the comfort and sustenance of such citizens when traveling in this country. Of course, in the absence of action by the Federal Government by treaty the States may regulate the ownership of real estate within their borders by citizens of foreign countries. In the control of international and interstate commerce the regulation of the Federal Government is necessarily exclusive. The intention was to permit the free flow of such commerce unrestrained by the States. But the question of the status of foreign citizens within the United States, their right to engage in business and own property, may or may not be regulated by treaty. It may well be the policy of the Federal Government to leave this to the States. There are many other subjects likewise which it might be found inexpedient for the Government to control by treaties with foreign nations. But the power exists, and whenever, in the judgment of the President and the Senate, it becomes necessary for the Federal Government to exercise this prerogative it is undoubtedly conferred by the Constitution.

"It is a principle of practical construction—the force of which all courts and lawyers recognize in the interpretation of constitutional and statutory provisions—that where a people, without question, have exercised such a power, and especially where it is in harmony with the laws and usages of nations, such practice is of great weight in arriving at the true construction of the constitutional provision.

"The fact that our Government has from the beginning made treaties regulating matters which, as between the Federal Government and the States, are ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the latter is very significant. We have seen that during the early days of the Republic, at the time these constitutional provisions were being formed, the Government exercised the right to make such treaties. It is equally true that it has continued to do so to the present time. In 1870 a treaty was negotiated with the Republic of Salvador (Treaties and Conventions, 1537), which was in existence until 1893, by which the citizens of each country resident in the other were guaranteed the right to purchase and hold lands and to engage in trade, manufacture, and mining.

"Thomas F. Bayard, when Secretary of State during President Cleveland's first administration, in discussing the subject said:

"That a treaty, however, can give to aliens such rights has been repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (citing cases); and consequently, however much hesitation there might be as to advising a new treaty containing such provisions, it is not open to this department to deny that the treaties now in existence giving rights of this class to aliens may in its municipal relations be regarded as operative in the States.

"During the very next year he negotiated a treaty with Peru (Treaties and Conventions, 1431), the eleventh article of which guaranteed to the citizens of each country the liberty to dispose of their real estate within the jurisdiction of the other by donation, testament, or otherwise, and providing that the heirs should succeed to such real estate whether by testament or ab intestato.

"Nearly every one of our treaties contain provisions, varying in form, regulating some one or other matter which is ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the State, and which, by the Constitution, is not committed to the Congress other than by the treaty-making clause. These provisions regulate the ownership and descent of land by inheritance or testament, the latter being a subject which has always been exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States, the right of foreign consuls to administer the estates of their deceased countrymen or to intervene in such administration (Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S., 317; In re Lombardi, 138 N. Y. S., 1007; Consul v. Westphal (Minn.), 139 N. W., 300), the right to engage in business, to own and dispose of personal property situated within the States, to travel and enjoy the same privileges as citizens of this country, and granting to foreign citizens free and open access to the courts of justice of the various States. It is true that at the present time a large number of our treaties contain provisions that should the property consist of real estate and the heirs, on account of their character as aliens, be prevented from entering into possession of the inhereitance, they shall be allowed a certain time in which to sell and dispose of the property and withdraw the proceeds; but the very right to inherit real estate within the States and to sell and dispose of it and withdraw the proceeds, in violation of State laws, when granted by treaty, is as much an interference with domestic concerns as any other and can not in principle be distinguished from the right to own real estate.

"The student of government, thoughtfully considering the circumstances under which this treaty-making power was conferred, the practice of nations, and especially of our own country, the decisions of our courts, the expressions of statesmen and publicists, can have little difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the power of the Federal Government to protect citizens of foreign countries in our midst is plenary. And yet we have been shamefully negligent in many instances in giving this protection. I am persuaded that the humiliating subterfuge resorted to by some of the Secretaries of State to escape this responsibility is owing to the fact that Congress has neglected to provide legislation to punish violations of treaty rights. The subject has been brought painfully to the public mind many times during the last 30 years. In 1880 Chinamen were mobbed at Denver, and at Rock Springs, Wyo., in 1885. Italians were lynched in New Orleans in 1891, and again at Rouse, Colo., in 1895. Mexicans were lynched in California in 1895, Italians at Tallulah, La., in 1899, and again at Erwin Miss., in 1901. Demands of foreign governments in many of these cases were met by the claim of the Secretary of State that the punishment for such offenses was exclusively within the power of States, over which the Federal Government had no control. Notably was this the case in the Mafia riots in Louisiana in 1899, when Secretary Blaine said:

"If it shall result that the case can be prosecuted only in the State courts of Louisiana, and the usual judicial investigation and procedure under the criminal law is not resorted to, it will then be the duty of the United States to consider whether some other form of redress may be asked.

"It is unnecessary to add that the Secretary came to the conclusion that the punishment for this offense was exclusively within the jurisdiction of Louisiana, but only because the Congress had neglected to pass legislation making such violations of our treaties criminal offenses remedial in the Federal courts. Is it any wonder that the Italian Government expressed surprise at this remarkable doctrine, and that in the note of Marquis Rudini to the Italian minister in Washington he said:

"Let the Federal Government reflect on its side if it is expedient to leave to the mercy of each State of the Union, irresponsible to foreign countries, the efficiency of treaties pledging its faith and honor to entire nations.

"As the distinguished Senator, Hon. Elihu Root, said in 1910, our Government is practically defenseless against claims for indemnity because of our failure to extend over these aliens the same protection that we extended to our own citizens, and the final result of the correspondence in each case has been the payment of indemnity, for the real reason that we have not performed our international duty. Presidents Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft each urged upon Congress the passage of a statute conferring on the Federal courts jurisdiction to punish such violations of Federal treaties by citizens of the various States, but to the present time Congress has not acted. Undoubtedly under decisions of the Supreme Court had such treaties, in addition to general guaranties to foreign citizens, contained explicit provisions for the punishment of offenses thereunder by the Federal courts, such treaties would have had the effect of laws and the Federal courts would have had jurisdiction, but the trouble is that these treaties have only contained provisions pledging the faith of the Government in general terms and have not contained explicit provisions for the punishment of such offenses. But the faith and honor of the Nation are pledged to their enforcement, and it is as much the duty of Congress to enact legislation to carry into effect these provisions of our treaties as it is to appropriate money and enact other legislation which Congress has always done to carry out the provisions of our international agreements. The result has been that the only recourse foreign nations have had has been to demand indemnity for such injuries, which this Government has always recognized and paid. No nation claiming the high prerogative of the treaty-making power has a right to shield itself behind the claim that one of the constituent States of the Union has violated the treaty, and that the Central Government has no authority to redress the grievance. It is a position that we resented when Brazil, in 1875, denied its accountability for the injury of an American citizen because it had been inflicted by one of the Provinces. Secretary Fish said:

"You represent that the facts as set forth in the memorial of the claimant are admitted by that Government, which, however, denies its accountability and says that the Province where the injury to Mr. Smith took place is alone answerable. Supposing, however, the case to be a proper one for the interposition of this Government, the reference of the claimant to the authorities of the Province for redress will not be acquiesced in. Those authorities can not be officially known to this Government. It is the imperial Government at Rio de Janeiro only which is accountable to this Government for any injury to the person or property of a citizen of the United States committed by the authorities of a Province. It is with that Government alone that we hold diplomatic intercourse. The same rule would be applicable to the case of a Brazilian subject who, in this country, might be wronged by the authorities of a State.

"I do not mean from anything I have said that our country should admit indiscriminately alien races to engage in industry and own property. But what I do mean is that this is a national question; that the Federal Government alone has the power to exclude them from the States; and, if admitted, to decide on what terms and conditions this should be done.

"It may, however, be said that if there are no implied limits to the treaty-making power, the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, might dismember the Union, abolish the structure of government guaranteed by the Constitution, or convey away the territory of the States.

"These arguments were advanced time and time again in the Constitutional Convention, and in the conventions of the various States, called to consider the adoption of the Constitution, and there are expressions of the courts to the effect that the treaty-making power is limited by these guaranties of the Federal Constitution. This, however, is an academic question, because it is not within human probability that there can ever come before the Federal court the question of the validity of a treaty made by this country by which it surrenders or changes its form of government, or by which any of the prerogatives of the Federal Government are taken away, or republican form of government destroyed in the States. When the time comes, if ever it shall, that such a demand is made, it will be backed by a military power to enforce it rather than by the untrammeled exercise of the treaty-making power.

"Considering the subject, however, from the academic view, certain principles are easily deduced. That the granting or purchase of territory is clearly within the treaty-making power is demonstrated by the law and usage of nations and by the practice of our own country. (Am. Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Peters, 542.) Undoubtedly it is not within the treaty-making power for the President and Senate to change the form of government, or to stipulate away any of the fundamental prerogatives of the Federal Government. These are guaranteed by provisions of the Federal Constitution coordinate with the treaty clause. A treaty abdicating the functions of the Supreme Court of the United States, if the making of such a treaty can be imagined, would undoubtedly be declared unconstitutional because the provisions of the Constitution creating the departments of Government are of equal force and effect with that conferring the treaty-making power. These questions can only be settled by the arbitrament of war, but the other questions are those pertaining to the administration of the law in the courts of the country. They are likely to arise at any time and disturb the peace of nations unless speedily settled on well-recognized principles in the courts of the contracting Governments. It is of the highest importance that our country, one of the great English-speaking peoples, claiming an advanced position among the nations of the earth in the science of enlightened government, in the principles of international law, in education and in Christianity, should be ever scrupulous in keeping its treaty obligations. They are as sacred as the private obligations which arise between man and man, in the manifold duties and relations of life in organized society. They are of higher importance in the development of world civilization, because they lie at the very foundation of peace and good order and maintenance of those lasting principles of international law which in the science of modern governments are taking the place of war in the settlement of disputes. We can have little influence in the great movement for world peace if we are neglectful in keeping our own treaty obligations, for the stability of international law and the fulfillment of national obligations is as necessary to the peace of the world as the stability and maintenance of law and order is necessary to the peace and prosperity of society. Law is the embodiment of the highest ideals of civilization. It has governed the relations of men in the most primitive and savage state, and in the modern and highest developed society. Before history recorded and left to succeeding generations the doings of men, law was the governing power and controlling influence of communities and nations. With the growth of government, the uplifting of physical and social conditions, law has been keeping pace with the march of progress. Its invisible forces dominate and control nations, man in all his relations in society, the tremendous transactions of modern economic life, and the minutest details of our social and industrial fabric. It is all-pervading and ever-present. Without it there is no government, no social order, no home. Its administration is the highest and noblest duty of man to his fellows. Its purity and stability are necessary to the peace, happiness, and prosperity of peoples. Its corruption is the destruction of the State and of the Nation."

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that if there is any debate I will not ask for its consideration. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by striking out the period at the end of the third paragraph thereof and adding in lieu thereof the following: ", or until January 1, 1921, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid-in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, and regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, several days ago I gave notice that I would address the Senate to-day on the proposed covenant of the league of nations. I shall confine my remarks to that subject, giving my individual views and convictions regarding it. I ask that I may be permitted to conclude my prepared speech before being interrupted, after which time I shall be very glad to answer any question asked or reply to any suggestion made by a Senator.

Mr. President, this Senate, empowered under the Constitution with the authority to approve or reject the pending treaty, containing the covenant of the proposed league of nations, is confronted with the gravest responsibility that has come to it within its history. I believe I am within the bounds of safe and moderate assertion when I affirm that never before in a world crisis has a legislative body had dependent upon its conclusions such important and far-reaching consequences. It is recognized that without our concurrence and cordial cooperation the contemplated league of nations is doomed to utter failure; if we withhold our support, the whole plan would immediately disappear, defeated, destroyed. Thus upon our deliberations and decision the future situation of the world largely depends. May our wisdom and patriotism be commensurate with our weighty responsibilities.

Mr. President, before discussing in detail the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations, the most important part of the proposed treaty, let us consider the conditions existing in the world out of which this league emerges as a rainbow of hope and promise. The world had practically concluded its bloodiest, its most brutal, most widely extended, and most destructive war. Twenty-two nations, comprising nine-tenths of the world's population of one and one-half billions, had engaged in a fierce and titanic conflict. The remaining one-tenth, comprising neutral nations, was indirectly involved, the minutest details of their lives and business being seriously affected. Thus practically all mankind was drawn into the vortex of this world conflagration. The expenditures of the various Governments involved, and the loss of life and property were stupendous and stagger the imagination. It is estimated that 7,400,000 men were killed and 7,175,000 were permanently disabled. I have read the statement that more than 4,000,000 soldiers were buried within 50 miles of Paris. Countless other millions, comprising noncombatants—children, women, and men—were destroyed by starvation, impoverishment, and oppression. The whole world has been enveloped in sorrow and mourning—scarcely a household without its empty chair, scarcely a soul without longings to hear again some voice forever silent. The destruction of property occasioned by the operations of armies and the occupation of hostile territory has been enormous, and it will take years of toil to repair the damage. When the war is finally ended and the armies disbanded, it is estimated that the world will be burdened with a public debt aggregating $190,000,000,000—more than one-third of its total wealth. This portends years of onerous taxation and severe privation. The war in its prosecution has consumed nearly one-half of the wealth of the world.

The losses in life and property exceed those of all wars since the beginning of recorded history. Our social order has been shaken to its very foundation. Civilization, embracing our priceless heritages of liberty, justice, varied betterments, and reforms, obtained only after centuries of effort and sacrifice, was nearly destroyed, escaping almost miraculously. Another such war and all would be lost—mankind would revert to the rule of brute force and barbarism of the Dark Ages. Having the use of the new implements for warfare on land, sea, and air, invented during the course of the recent conflict, future wars would be more ruinous and destructive than the last. The severe shock of another world war, intensified and augmented in destructive force, would shatter our civilization, crumbling it into ruins, like many magnificent civilizations of the past. Therefore the most important problem, and the greatest and gravest duty before us, is to devise means of rendering another world conflagration unnecessary, and, as far as can be done, making it impossible. Before this, all other questions fade into insignificance. This is the paramount obligation of the world's responsible statesmen. To accomplish this laudable purpose the accredited representatives of 22 States have included in the draft of the peace treaty a provision for establishing a league of nations. The objects sought by this league are to establish a peace based on justice and strict regard for the rights, political and economic, of various peoples and nationalities, thus rendering future wars unnecessary, and then to prevent, as far as human agencies at present are capable, further wholesale bloodshed. Does the plan proposed tend to this accomplishment?

The covenant of the league, as at present constituted, has been assailed from two opposite sources. One contention is that it creates a supernation, submerging into its sovereignty the sovereignty of all the signatories to the covenant; that a supreme world sovereign is created to whom the nations are subordinated. The other contention, urged by its opponents with equal insistence, is that the covenant is a worthless paper parchment, without sovereignty, without power, and hence the league will be helpless to prevent war or to adjust any chaotic political conditions which may arise. It is impossible for both of these contentions to be true. These two conceptions of the league are so diverse, so widely separated, that they can never be reconciled. These two schools of disputants will doubtless continue their interminable debate upon the correctness of their respective interpretations. However, neither contention is correct. The league will neither be a superstate or sovereign, nor a helpless, powerless, association of nations.

The instrument creating the "league of nations" is a "covenant" entered into by sovereign States for the accomplishment of certain purposes in designated ways. No nation surrenders its sovereignty by becoming a member of the league. One of the attributes of sovereignty is the ability to make "covenants" or agreements. None of the members of the league subscribe to undertakings which impair their sovereignty. Under the terms of article 1, membership in the league is confined to "any fully self-governing State." That a State reserves its full sovereignty when entering the league is further emphasized and conclusively settled by the provision of the covenant allowing any member, upon giving two years' notice of its intention, to withdraw from the league. No nation, super or otherwise, ever thus expressly provided means for its dissolution. The right to terminate the obligations assumed by the signing of the covenant is expressly reserved, the same as is frequently done in the execution of treaties. This covenant, if ratified by the Senate, would be no more nor less than a treaty legalized under our Constitution. The one impairs our sovereignty no more than the other. It may be contended that it is unwise to assume some of the obligations which are created by the covenant, but it is absurd to contend that in ratifying this covenant we impair in any way our national sovereignty. The covenant clearly avoids the creation of a superstate to dominate as supreme sovereign the affairs of the world.

Mr. President, it is impossible to exaggerate the difficulties confronting those who undertook the formation of this league. A world war with its vast disturbances had to be settled. The wrongs of centuries had to be corrected, or else a new war, of greater magnitude than the one just concluded, would soon engulf the world. Settlements had to be made confirming the political and economic rights of many people; differences, jealousies, and animosities had to be reconciled; persuasion and sternness had to be wisely blended to obtain results. Peace when made must be secured, at least for a reasonable time, in order that society might recover its stability and be rescued from present prostration. In the preparation of a plan to prevent a recurrence of the calamities through which the world had just passed it was necessary to reconcile the jealous pride of small States and the aggressive power of large ones. Concessions were necessary in order to obtain the approval of home governments. Considering all the circumstances, the results obtained by the peace conference are amazing, and its creation of the league of nations will be noted as one of the world's greatest achievements. The plan for the formation of the league is skillfully conceived, and the only one possible under existing political conditions. It contemplates that the 46 States named, constituting more than four-fifths of the world's population, wealth, and power, shall become signatories to a covenant and assume the obligations therein imposed. It anticipates ultimately the incorporation as members of the league of the remaining nations, provision for their admission being inserted.

When the nations now excluded have reformed, have organized stable governments, capable of performing international obligations, and give assurance that their membership will be helpful and not detrimental, they will be admitted. In the end it is hoped that the beneficence of the league will be extended to all nations and people. The league as constituted is so strong that dangers from the formation of another league, antagonistic to it, are almost negligible. No nation would venture into so hazardous an enterprise. The dangers to the success of this league will come from within—never from without. Nations will be desirous of membership in order to share its unmistakable benefits.

Mr. President, we will next consider the method formulated for the operation of the league. Article 2 of the covenant provides:

> The action of the league under this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an assembly and of a council, with a permanent secretariat.

Article 3 provides:

> The assembly shall consist of representatives of the members of the league.
> At the meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote and may have not more than three representatives.

Thus, in the assembly each member of the league, whether large or small, has one vote, the equality of the members being absolutely preserved. The assembly will be composed of representatives of the members of the league, who will be selected in accordance with the laws of the respective States. In the case of the United States the representatives, being officers created by a treaty, would be appointed as provided by an act of Congress. The covenant clearly defines how legal decisions of the assembly will be reached. Article 5 contains the following:

> Except where otherwise provided in this covenant, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

Thus the action of the league must be unanimous, except where expressly provided otherwise in the covenant. A thorough examination of the covenant discloses that when the assembly acts alone, not jointly with the council, it is only authorized to decide without unanimous agreement upon the admission of new members, routine matters, methods of procedure, and the publication of a divided report upon matters of dispute referred to it. With the unanimous agreement of the council, a majority vote of the assembly can approve the selection of a general secretary and increase the membership of the council, and a majority of the assembly, with the unanimous approval of the representatives of those members of the league represented in the council, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, can make a report upon disputed matters referred to it, which shall have the same effect as a similar unanimous report made by the council.

Much opposition has been urged against the league because a great Nation like the United States has only one vote in the assembly and small nations like Siam and Liberia each has a full vote, and also because Great Britain has one vote and her five self-governing colonies a vote each. But what difference does the number of votes make when on all important matters the action of the assembly must be unanimous, or have the unanimous concurrence of the council, upon which the United States is permanently represented? Thus in all matters of importance before the assembly, except in cases where she is a party to a dispute, the United States will possess a veto power, and a decision can only be reached by her concurrence. Thus the question of the number of votes in the assembly held by different groups is not vital. The league could never be organized on any basis other than that of equal representation for its members. If members were accorded difference in representation, upon what basis should the apportionment be made? If upon population, China and India would dominate the league, and the United States would have only one-fifteenth of the number. If based upon wealth and military power, the situation would be equally as uncertain and unsatisfactory. It was a wise conclusion to give equal representation to all members and require unanimous agreement upon all important matters before action can be obtained. By doing this, important national interests were not left to the decision of uncertain and changing majorities. It eliminated the necessity for intriguing manipulation, with its attendant evils, to control a majority of the representatives. By this method the interest of the United States in all important matters, except those to which she herself is a disputing party, is erected safely upon the solid foundation of her own judgment and will, and is not left to repose upon the quicksands of uncertain and shifting majorities. The assembly as constituted furnishes ample means for the protection of the United States. At present this is the best and only possible manner in which the assembly could have been organized.

Mr. President, we will next examine the formation of the council, the most important agency of the league, and wherein is imposed most of the power possessed by the league. Nearly all the action of the league is obtained through the council. Article 4 of the covenant provides:

> The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly, the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain shall be members of the council.
> With the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

Each member of the league represented in the council shall have one vote and only one representative. The selection of the representatives of the members of the league in the council would be made as provided by the laws of the respective countries. In the case of the United States the appointment could be made in pursuance of an act of Congress. The selection of the four members of the league to send representatives to the council by the assembly must be made by unanimous agreement. Hence the four members of the council must be acceptable to the United States. Thus out of nine members of the council four must be selected with the consent of the United States, which, added to our representation, would make five out of nine. The council thus constituted furnishes ample protection to the interest of the United States. The decisions of the council must be unanimous, except where otherwise expressly provided in the covenant. This requirement of unanimity is only waived in matters of procedure and the appointment of special committees of investigation. In obtaining unanimous action for the expulsion of members of the league or in making reports upon disputes referred to the council, the representatives of the members affected or interested in both cases are excluded from participating in the decision of the council. Thus upon all substantial matters that can come before the council for action, except disputes referred to it for report to which the United States is a party, it can reach no decision, take no action, without the concurrence of the representative of the United States. Thus the interest of the United States is amply safeguarded in both the assembly and council, the only agencies of action under the league. Under the covenant we can not be heavily burdened nor driven to do undesirable things by unfair and unstable majorities, but practically all our undertakings, before they become operative, must have the approval of our accredited representatives. We do not venture forth in world affairs, as claimed by some of the opponents of the covenant, to bow in submission to unfriendly majorities, but we continue the master of our own destiny and retain a controlling voice in determining the pathway we shall travel.

Mr. President, as previously stated, the primary object sought to be obtained in the formation of the league is the preservation of peace and the prevention of war. It is an earnest and humane effort to save mankind and civilization from all the ravages and horrors incident to modern warfare. It seeks to introduce into international affairs the rule of law, order, and justice, peaceful consideration and conciliation, and thus eliminate international chaos, which in the past has been so productive of violence and bloody conflicts. It seeks to crown and make perpetual the decisive victory achieved by the valor of our soldiers and sailors and the sacrifices of our people by giving mankind a lasting peace founded on justice, right, and reason. It contains the combined efforts of the world's chosen and most enlightened statesmen to settle the many perplexing questions engendered by this great World War and embodies their hope of placing civilization on a surer and broader foundation. It seeks to avoid war by removing as far as possible the causes which have occasioned conflicts in the past and by providing methods of settling international disputes without resorting to force. It utilizes the treasured experience of the past to settle present difficulties and to build for the future. Let us examine calmly and patriotically—not in heated partisanship, not with the critical scrutiny of a disputant—the provisions contained in this covenant and determine whether they will accomplish the commendable purposes sought. Let us examine and see whether this structure, as claimed by some, is reared on sand and will totter at the first storm or whether the world's greatest and noblest builders have placed it on rock foundations, which will enable it to stand and be a safe refuge to the world in hours of storm and stress.

Mr. President, the first important provision contained in the covenant to relieve the world from existing and heavy burdens and to remove one of the most fertile sources of war in the past is that relating to the reduction of armaments. It is contained in article 8, and is as follows:

> The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

Does anyone dispute the wisdom and soundness of this declaration? Does anyone desire to expend on armies and navies greater sums than are required for our national security and to insure to us our international rights? Expenditures beyond these for naval and military purposes are wasteful extravagance, burdening business, retarding enterprise, and depriving the Government and the people of much money that could be wisely devoted to many commendable undertakings. The purpose is most laudable and is sought to be obtained in a way that could not in the least be prejudicial to the United States. To accomplish this reduction the covenant provides:

> The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.
> Such plans shall be subject to reconstruction and revision at least every 10 years.
> After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

What better plan for disarmament could be devised? The council is directed to prepare a general plan of disarmament for the consideration of the Governments of the several members of the league, which plans are not binding upon any State until approved by that State. In formulating these plans the council is directed to reduce armaments to the lowest point consistent with the national safety of each member of the league, considering also the geographical situation and circumstances of danger or attack confronting each member and also the retention of sufficient forces by all members of the league to insure the discharge of international obligations. If the council observes fairly and honestly these principles in the preparation of the plan of disarmament, no State would be threatened in its security, no State would be left helpless at the mercy of another, and the league would be made secure from internal and external overthrow. What guaranties are provided to make effective these desirable conditions? The report and recommendations of the council must have the concurrence of the representatives of the nine States which constitute the council. Thus the report and recommendation of the council can not be made without the approval of the representative of the United States. Without this approval the whole plan of disarmament fails and nations are left, as now, to have such armies and navies as they may themselves determine. Even when the report and recommendations of the council are unanimously made, they do not become binding on any State until regularly approved by its Government. Under our Government the proposed plan to be effective in binding us must have the sanction of Congress, which is intrusted, under the Constitution, with the power of raising armies and equipping navies. Thus the interest of the United States in any plan of disarmament is amply safeguarded. No general plan of disarmament can be presented without her consent, no obligations imposed upon her without the approval of her Congress, where reposes our national security. It would seem to me that a plan of disarmament devised and adopted by most of the nations of the world upon these conditions, if the United States has any foresight whatever in the exercise of her power, would give her far greater security than any policy of national isolation outside the league, surrounded by nations jealous and apprehensive of her great power and liable at any moment to combine for her overthrow.

If she enters the league she obtains national security by the reduction of her armaments and those of other nations upon plans recommended with her consent and accepted by her Government. If she remains out she only obtains a precarious security by competing with other nations in the creation of vast armies and navies, with their attendant frightful and staggering expense and the certain assurance that some day all her vast national interest will be exposed to the hazards of war. One reposes national security upon the solid foundation of calm foresight and statesmanship; the other places it upon the quicksands of impending wars. We obtain greater security with far less expenditures. A large part of the immense sums now appropriated for armaments would be utilized to secure better educational advantages, to construct good roads, to build better homes, to aid religious and charitable institutions, to develop new industries, and for the general advance of comfort and civilization. There can never be any disarmament with safety, nor will there ever be any, except a general one on the plan outlined in this covenant. Would any nation be so unwise as to make separate treaties for disarmament and leave herself exposed to danger from nations with whom no such treaties have been negotiated? Does anyone prefer that instead of the disarmament provided in this league that the United States should enter into an alliance with one or two of the great powers of the world, and thus be able to reduce her armaments by consenting that the united military forces of the alliance should be used for the offensive and defensive warfare of each member? This would be committing us to the old combination of powers which has deluged the world with war, and which has usually created another combination, the two then fiercely contending for world supremacy. This would be inviting us to a world war instead of a world peace.

Mr. President, no disarmament is possible except a general one, as proposed in this covenant, fortified by the guaranties contained therein. If this league with its plan of disarmament is rejected, it means that we and all other first-class powers will continue in mad and feverish competition constructing navies and creating armies. It means burdens and taxes exceeding anything the people have ever previously borne. It means conscription and universal military service. It means the organization of nations and their industries continuously for war purposes. It means world uncertainty, unrest, and apprehension, followed ultimately by cruel, extensive, and destructive wars. The statesmen of the world owe it to mankind to save it from these wretched conditions and future calamities of world wars. Those of us who favor this league believe it will accomplish these ends. Those who antagonize it offer nothing in its place, propose nothing better. They content themselves with insisting that mankind shall continue strictly in the old pathway that it has traveled so long with bleeding, bruised feet and mutilated limb, and upon which it recently encountered so many dangers and difficulties and barely escaped disaster.

Mr. President, another advantage contained in this plan is that, when adopted by any Government, "limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council." This concurrence must be unanimous. Then, after the amount of armament has been fixed for each member of the league and approved by each as fair and just, it can not be changed without the consent of the representative of the United States upon the council. This gives us additional security and enables us to protect ourselves from the dangers of increased armaments. The plan fixes no minimum limit of armaments, but only a maximum limit. This compels no nation to make expenditures for war purposes. With the exception of not exceeding the maximum limit, the size of armies and navies and the quantity of war equipment is left absolutely to the discretion of each State. The league only intervenes when the armaments of a nation become so large as to threaten others. I venture the prediction that instead of this restriction being a restraint upon the United States Government this Government will never attain the maximum assigned. The great difficulty encountered in the past to induce this nation to have sufficient naval and military forces for defense against apparent dangers fully justifies this conclusion. The effect of the limit will be to place needed restraint upon ambitious and aggressive powers.

In order to meet the changed conditions which continually arise, it is provided: "Such plans shall be subject to reconstruction and revision at least every 10 years." When this occurs the same requirements for unanimity in the council and adoption by each State continue. Thus the interests of the United States in this respect are fully protected. The plan seeks also to eliminate as far as possible the manufacture of munitions and implements of war by private enterprises, which create large interests favorable to war and have done much to keep the world excited and embroiled. It is hoped never again will the world be cursed with the Krupps and millionaire munition manufacturers, possessed of great political power, engaged in pernicious propaganda to incite the enmity of nations and thus produce war, to their own enrichment. To prevent secret preparation for war and suppress danger to unsuspecting nations, "The members of the league undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military and naval programs, and the conditions of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes." To secure a faithful compliance with these requirements of disarmament, a permanent commission is created to advise the council upon their execution and on military and naval questions generally. Thus, from whatever standpoint viewed, it seems to me the provisions contained in the covenant for disarmament are fair, reasonable, and just, will be effective, and furnish the United States ample safeguards for her security.

Mr. President, the history of the world proves that a large majority of wars have been occasioned by a desire of conquest and to obtain additional territory. Conquest and territorial aggression since society and governments were first organized have steeped mankind in war, misery, and violence. Eliminate these causes of war and the peace of the world is almost secured. This covenant undertakes to accomplish this by article 10, which is as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Those of our countrymen who antagonize the league have directed against this provision their most persistent and unrelenting opposition. They have insisted that the assumption by us of this obligation would embroil us in interminable wars with all the attendant expense and danger. They have presented dire forebodings of United States troops being sent to every part of the globe to settle petty territorial quarrels. They contend that in adopting this provision of the covenant the United States uses her great power, without any recompense whatever, to bring to other nations repose and security. They declare that the acceptance of this would impose upon the United States intolerable burdens and would bring no substantial benefits. They protest against it as a wide departure from our former foreign policy which must inevitably lead to international complications and trouble.

Let us examine this section of the covenant thoughtfully and dispassionately to determine whether these objections obtain, and whether our burdens or our benefits would exceed by our acceptance. It should be noted that this is an obligation assumed, not by the league as an entirety, but by each member individually. Each member of the league undertakes, first, to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. This is a solemn promise made by each member of the league that it will never endeavor to acquire by conquest or aggression any of the territory or possessions of any other member of the league. In common parlance, we would agree not to rob any of our associates in the league and they would agree not to rob us. If this league is consummated, as contemplated, it means immediately that four-fifths of the world, and eventually all the world, agrees to cease from wars of conquest and despoilment. If adhered to it would eliminate the causes which have produced most of the wars of the past. If observed, there is not a member of the league, great or small, that ever would have its individual, political existence threatened; and no more would the history of the world be encumbered with the frightful wreck of people and nations through lust of conquest. It means the dawn of a new day in human affairs when practically the world agrees to refrain from wars of despoilment, a day in which each receding hour will bring greater splendors of peace, progress, and prosperity.

Now, when the nations of the world, sobered by sorrow and suffering almost too stupendous to bear, with nearly one accord are willing to raise their hands and make the solemn pledge, are we sullenly and stubbornly to stand aside and become a stumblingblock in the way of this noble achievement? Are we to miss the days of our opportunity, foretold with almost divine foresight by our fathers, when we should become the exemplar of the world for justice, liberty, and peace? Why should we refrain from undertaking to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the league? Do any of them have possessions that we view with covetous eyes and propose to seize and annex? I know of none. Our territory is ample for our purposes and development. We can obtain neither increased wealth nor strength by endeavoring to assimilate new, incongruous peoples. Are there lurking among us those possessed of imperialistic designs who desire to embark the United States upon a career of expansion and are unwilling to see her fettered by this honorable promise? If such exist, the pledge should be made in order to restrain them from ever forcing this Government into such venturesome and dangerous enterprise. Germany to-day, wrecked and ruined, furnishes melancholy proof of the sad fact that the road of ambition and conquest inevitably leads to disaster. From every consideration we can well afford to enter into almost a world compact not to engage in marauding wars to seize the territory of others, not to overthrow their independence and subject them to our will and rule. The formation of such a wide and far-reaching agreement constitutes one of the most important facts in the history of a gloomy and troubled world and marks the attainment of what the most hopeful idealist never thought possible. If I read aright what is in the heart and mind of my countrymen, they are determined that no adverse action of theirs shall shatter these pleasing prospects and make these bright hopes dissolve into empty dreams.

Mr. President, the second obligation assumed by each member of the league individually is to "preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league." This is a natural corollary from the first. In the former we undertake not to rob our associates ourselves, and in this we agree not to permit others to do so, each associate assuming a like obligation to us.

It should be noted that this guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence is limited to those cases where they are threatened or attacked by external aggression, and does not apply to revolution within a nation. A nation's internal affairs are left undisturbed. A nation can re-form, modify, or change its existing government according to the wishes of the people. If necessary to accomplish these purposes, force can be used. A nation may separate and divide into several units, as her people may determine, provided no external force is applied.

The disruption of a nation by external aggression is prohibited. The obtrusive interference of one nation into the affairs of another, inciting dissensions, destroying unity, weakening its influence and power, would be arrested. No more would there be pressure upon weak nations by the selfish and strong to obtain concessions and "spheres of influence" to the serious detriment of the State coerced, and to all self-respecting nations which refuse to engage in such reprehensible practices.

Competition among powers in exploitation and despoliation would cease. No member of the league, great or small, as previously stated, would ever have its territorial integrity or political independence threatened. Each member of the league, in repose and confidence, would be permitted to work out its own individual destiny, to develop its own culture and civilization. No more would weak States, whose precarious existence has occasioned so many wars, have ever hovering over them the grave apprehension of being subdued and absorbed. Nationality, with its vital, stimulating patriotism, would be preserved, given new life and opportunity.

Mr. President, thoughtful persons recognize the importance of giving such a guaranty now, at least for a limited period, if the peace of the world is to be maintained. The autocratic governments that controlled the vast territories of Russia, Germany, Austria, and Turkey have been overthrown and as yet no real, stable governments established. A large portion of each of these countries is in a condition of political chaos, controlled by turbulent masses, and engaged in warfare among themselves. Some of the new States created out of this immense territory, without the guaranty of the league, would be overthrown, and would return to the domination of their former oppressors. We would render no service to such States in starting them on a noble career and then immediately abandoning them to again become helpless preys.

Some of the new States, possessed of high ambitions, might, unless held by the restraints of the league, venture into wars of conquest and annexation. Without the steadying influences of this guaranty, the chances are that at no distant day war would again be precipitated in eastern Europe, become again a world conflagration, bringing greater calamities than those we have just experienced.

Hon. Elihu Root, former Secretary of State, one of our most thoughtful and farseeing statesmen, in discussing the league, recognized the great immediate need and importance of this article, and recommended its acceptance with an amendment providing that any member could, after the expiration of five years from the signing of the covenant, terminate its obligations under this article by giving one year's notice in writing. After careful consideration he reached the conclusion that the best interest of the United States and of the world demanded the assumption of this obligation for the term of five years. He would have extended the obligations of this article longer than is provided by the covenant.

Article 1 has the following provision:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

The requirement of two years' notice is reasonable, as no member should be permitted suddenly to terminate so important an engagement. Neither would it be just for a member to escape its accrued international and covenant obligations by withdrawing. Members that receive the benefits of the league should also bear its burdens. Especially would the United States scorn to avail herself of the privilege of retiring from the league without fully and honorably discharging every obligation. The contention that the United States could not withdraw without the unanimous consent of the council or assembly, the only bodies that can act for the league, is wholly untenable. No power whatever is conferred upon either of these bodies to act upon this question; no authority is given anywhere to compel the retention of a member after giving the required notice of withdrawal.

Disputes arising prior to the withdrawal must be settled as provided in the covenant. This the United States, if she becomes a member, agrees to. But under no provision in this covenant would the United States undertake to let the council, assembly, or any body or person determine whether she had discharged her obligations, and to permit her to withdraw from the league. Hence she reserves this decision for herself. The decision of this question, as it affects her, would be left to the judgment and conscience of her own Government, free from any agreement to submit its decision elsewhere. If the decision occasions differences, it will be like all other disagreements between sovereignties regarding interpretation of treaties and international obligations, and would be settled as it exists under present international law.

Thus, under this covenant, the United States, by giving notice of withdrawal from the league, can limit her obligations under this article, and under the entire league, to a time not far to exceed two years. If this treaty is ratified, including the covenant of the league of nations, the United States can fully perform all her obligations to her allies, discharge her duties to the new nations she has aided in creating, and which she encouraged to revolt against their former masters with many hazards, use her powerful influence to give repose to a disturbed world, bring to a final settlement a war in which she was one of the greatest factors, and then honorably retire, having performed a great service to the world and brought inestimable benefits to herself.

For the United States to reject this treaty and league at this time, involving, as it does, such small possibility of peril for her, would mean that she would skulk in the greatest world crisis that has ever occurred. It would mean she would consent to a world settlement without her voice, without her influence.

This article can impose no burdens upon the United States from which she can not in a reasonable time honorably relieve herself, if she is so disposed. She is committed to no course of action from which, if disappointments should develop, she could not honorably retire and return to the situation she occupied before the acceptance of this covenant. In a short time after ratification the people of the United States, with a knowledge of its practical operations, can determine whether they will continue in or retire from this league. The United States having ventured forth in this war and become one of the controlling influences in world affairs, under the covenant can successfully aid in the settlement of matters so urgently pressing for solution, and then retire, if she so desires, to a policy of national isolation, and become, if so inclined—as has been urged by some—a national hermit.

But, Mr. President, honor, prudence, self-interest, and national prestige—invaluable assets—all demand that we participate in the settlement of the present disturbance of the world produced by a war in which we were one of the most potential participants. The war is not completed until such a safe and proper settlement is made. Then, too, the world is so closely connected by steam, aircraft, cable, telegraph, and telephone, so deeply touched by racial and political influences, that a political convulsion in any part of the world necessarily affects the entire world. Who would have thought when the misguided youth Prinzip assassinated the Austrian heir and his morganatic wife in the streets of Sarajevo that in less than three years over 2,000,000 United States troops would be fighting in France in the most gigantic war of all times? Who realized that that crime would call a world to arms? Our interests and commerce are so varied, so vast, permeating every quarter of the globe, that in the future it will be almost impossible for us to escape world embroilments. Prudence and wisdom demand that, at least now, we should be present and extinguish the embers that produce flames, and see that the flames, if started, do not become world conflagrations which will envelop us.

Mr. President, the assertion that this article would tend to produce, instead of prevent, wars can not be sustained. This guaranty, made by more than four-fifths of the world, including the present dominant military powers, will, I believe, be sufficient without force to insure the peace of the world. Reckless, indeed, would be that nation which would issue a challenge of defiance to so powerful a league and embark upon the venturesome enterprise of conquest. Any nation would realize that it had more to lose than to gain by so dangerous an undertaking. What has occurred since our announcement of the Monroe doctrine furnishes convincing proof of the correctness of this contention. When a small and feeble nation in comparison to many others, we boldly proclaimed that North and South America were no longer open to colonization; that we would not permit the conquest of any portion of these continents by outside powers; that other nations would not be permitted to aid Spain in reducing her revolting colonies to subjection; and that we would not recognize the transference of Spain's rights or sovereignty to any other Government.

Many viewed the announcement of this doctrine with great alarm, saw in it many perils for this Nation, and prophesied that it would be the cause of innumerable wars. The promulgation of this doctrine gave freedom to one-half of the world, has saved for almost a century the Western Hemisphere from external aggression, and yet the United States has never invoked force for its maintenance. The very knowledge that the infringement of this doctrine would encounter in resistance the full power of this Government has been sufficient to restrain all nations. It deterred both Great Britain and Germany in Venezuela; it compelled without conflict the withdrawal of a large French army from Mexico; it has stood as a protecting shield, never yet openly assaulted, around all America. If the mere announcement of this doctrine by one nation has been sufficient to protect without war from external aggression all America, though great military powers have looked with covetous eyes upon her fair possessions, how much more would the solemn guaranties of this powerful league be effective. We may reasonably expect that the territorial integrity and political independence of the members would be preserved without the necessity arising for the use of force. The apprehension that this article will involve us in many wars is unfounded; it will be most potential in the preservation of peace for us and the world.

Mr. President, it should be noted that when in this article we guarantee the territorial integrity of all members of the league, we receive at the same time from all of them a like guaranty of our territorial possessions. The obligation is mutual. While it is true our continental possessions are safe with any reasonable preparations for defense, yet we occupy exposed positions, which require an immense Navy and a large standing Army to make us absolutely safe. The Philippine Islands are easily open to attack from either a European or an Asiatic power possessed of a strong navy, supplemented by a large and efficient army. These islands have occasioned us in the past great apprehension. These islands are so scattered and difficult of defense, so far from our base of supplies, that their protection in war is dependent upon our unchallenged control of the seas. In case of threatened danger we would be compelled to mass there large armies to prevent surprise and any lodgment by the enemy. These far-flung islands are to us a constant source of peril, yet we will never be base enough absolutely to desert them, toss them unprotected in the whirlpool of world politics, to become the prey of predatory nations. Plans for their independence have been accompanied by the suggestion that their integrity should be guaranteed by several of the strong powers. If we accord them freedom, we can now obtain for them, through this league, a complete guaranty, and thus honorably relieve ourselves of bearing alone this heavy burden. Whether retained by us or given their independence, through this league they will be preserved from all external aggression. In order to safeguard these islands, to which policy we are committed by every consideration of honor and interest, if this league is rejected, it will be necessary for us, in the present disturbed condition of the world, to construct the largest Navy afloat, and have an Army equal to that of any nation. Shall we embark on this great military expense and expansion, or accept the league and with it the honorable pledge of Great Britain and Japan, the only two nations from which the islands could ever be threatened, together with that of other members, to aid in preserving them from all external aggression?

Mr. President, considering this article, we should also reflect that the Panama Canal, its defenses, and the islands owned by us in the Caribbean Sea are outlying territories, requiring for their defense immense naval and military armaments. Under existing conditions we have always asserted that our hold upon this canal was no stronger than the American Navy. This canal, with the exception of our home territory, is the most valuable possession we have. The development of our varied industries, our national prestige, and safety demand that the canal should be under our control and ownership. This is a national policy as fixed as the eternal stars. For its maintenance there is no sacrifice we would refuse. Is our hold upon this canal lessened or strengthened by this article? This is a vital question. Great Britain is the only nation sufficiently strong upon the sea to challenge our ownership. With a navy far exceeding ours, she constitutes the only menace. In this article she pledges not only to respect herself our ownership of the canal and zone, but to preserve it from all external aggression. Thus our ownership under the league would be made as secure as it could be made by national promise and power. But this pledge of members of the league is made doubly secure by the plan of disarmament which, when prepared and presented, must have the approval of our representative upon the council and then be sanctioned by Congress. Thus under the league we obtain not only this important guaranty, but in addition a naval and military force which in comparison with that possessed by other members will, in our judgment, afford us ample security. If the defense of the canal is made dependent upon force, it is safer under the plan of the league than in a fierce race to outstrip all possible competitors in naval and military armaments. The one reposes its safety upon what our calm judgment dictates; the other hazards its safety upon our chances of success in this wild competition.

Mr. President, while the obligation under article 10 is assumed individually by the members of the league, yet its enforcement requires the cooperation of the several members. The article provides:

> In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Thus whenever the territorial integrity or the political independence of any member is violated or threatened the council meets and advises the means of averting the breach of the covenant. This action of the council must be unanimous. The recommendation for the enforcement of the obligation imposed by this article must have the approval of the representative of the United States upon the council.

The unanimous recommendation of the council is only advisory, and must be approved by the Governments of the several members of the league. This insures that the burden under this article will be fairly and properly distributed. While each member of the league makes a solemn pledge of mutual protection, yet each reserves its right of judgment as to duty and obligation in each case as it arises, and the means by which it shall be discharged. Thus under article 10 no troops of the United States could be sent to engage in war without the advice of her representative in the council and the approval of her Congress. This insures us against undue burdens and impositions. It leaves the extent of our moral and political obligations to our own sense of honor, and we ourselves measure the just demands upon our plighted promise. It creates no supertribunal issuing to us its dictatorial commands. We select and follow our own pathway of duty and obligation. If we make this pledge, we will never shirk compliance with its just demands. Broken faith, violated promises, refusal of just claims, have never yet darkened the honorable history of America.

Mr. President, the next important provisions contained in the covenant for the promotion of peace are those providing for the settlement of international disputes. They are far-reaching and will be most potential for the accomplishment of the purpose desired. The first of these is contained in article 12, as follows:

> The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

Another portion of the article requires the award to be made in a reasonable time and the report of the council within six months after submission. Under this article the parties to the dispute can select as the means of adjustment either arbitration or inquiry by the council. They agree to submit the matter of dispute to one or the other, and not to resort to war until three months after the award or report. This is a most effective method of preventing war. It extends the sphere of law and justice, the best consummation of a high civilization. It gives time for passion and animosities to cool and lessen and for reason to assert her sway. War only comes after other methods of settlement have failed. It gives time for the people who bear the burdens and suffer the sacrifices of war to reflect and enables them to restrain their own Governments from venturing into unjust and perilous wars.

Article 13 of the covenant controls matters submitted to arbitration. It is as follows:

> The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration, and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.
> Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration. For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.
> The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Under this article arbitration is not compulsory. It is left absolutely to the members of the league to determine whether the matter of dispute shall be submitted to arbitration. It is left for them to decide whether it is a suitable matter for arbitration. The article specifies interpretation of treaties, disputes as to a fact, which, if established, would constitute a breach of international obligations, and the extent of reparation for such breach as generally suitable for arbitration. But this is only a declaration addressed to the judgment and will of the members of the league. The parties to the dispute are left entirely free to select the members of the court of arbitration. The members of the league agree to abide by the award and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league who complies with the award. This is an honorable promise to fulfill a pledged obligation. Without this arbitration would be a complete farce and failure. It also conveys an assurance to each member of the league that if it honestly complies with the award it will be secured from war by all members of the league.

Mr. President, this great extension of arbitration will bring inestimable benefits to the world. It will lessen wars; it will increase respect for law and tend to more friendly relations between the nations. It is a wonderful achievement when four-fifths of the world enter into an agreement of arbitration. It marks a great advance of the forces that work for the betterment of mankind.

Let us next examine and see the method of procedure under the covenant when a party refuses to comply with the award. Under article 12 the parties to the dispute have each agreed, "in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators." This gives time for each nation calmly to consider the consequences of war; to determine thoughtfully whether the differences are of sufficient importance to justify hostilities; to invoke diplomacy and the assistance of the council and other nations to reach a settlement. Article 13 also provides:

> In the event of any failure to carry out such an award the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Thus while the parties to the dispute are restrained for three months from precipitating war, the council can exercise its influence to obtain a settlement. The council proposes what should be done to make effective the award. The action of the council must be unanimous and thus have the approval of the representative of the United States. The action of the council being only advisory, proposals must, if force is required to effect the award, have the approval of the Governments of the several members of the league. Thus under this article the United States could never be brought to war except with the approval of its representative on the council and the sanction of Congress. It is believed that the proposals of the council will be sufficient to obtain compliance with the award. If not, then it will be left to the judgment and will of each member of the league to determine to what extent it will go in carrying out the recommendations of the council. Thus under this covenant arbitration has all its usual desirable benefits, supplemented with the further advantage that it may be enforced when the necessity for so doing appeals to the judgment of a sufficient number of the members of the league.

The next important provision to insure peace and prevent war between nations is that providing for the settlement of international disputes which have not been referred to arbitration. It is contained in article 15, as follows:

> If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

This is a reiteration of the agreement contained in article 12. If a party should refuse to submit a matter of dispute likely to lead to a rupture either to arbitration or the council, as agreed upon, this article provides that either party to the dispute may refer the matter to the council. This is a method provided to compel compliance with the obligation entered into to submit disputed matters either to arbitration or the council before proceeding to war.

When the matter is referred to the council it first exerts itself to obtain a satisfactory settlement between the parties. Thus there is created an official body specially directed to exert its good offices to compose differences between the members of the league. The advice and suggestions of the council, its efforts to reach an accommodation between the parties, can not be resented as an unwarranted interference. It acts officially as a cool, strong, soothing mediator between disputants. The council specially delegated to do this work of conciliation will become a great instrument in effecting settlement of disturbing disputes. Composed of the representatives of great powers, commissioned to allay the causes of national irritation and enmities, its advice and conclusions will be received with profound respect. The existence of such a body in the past would have averted many wars which have scourged mankind. If the council fails to settle the matter, the covenant provides:

> The council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Let us next examine and see what the effect of the report will be when made. It is provided:

> If such council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

Thus if the report fails to obtain this unanimity it has no effect other than that derived from its influence upon public opinion. In this case all the members of the league, including the disputants, are left free and unfettered "to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice." A divided report imposes no obligation whatsoever. Let us next consider the effect of a report unanimously made. The covenant provides:

> If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

This provision has occasioned much criticism and opposition. Forebodings of dire ill have been presented as coming to us from this article and provision in case we should enter the league. It is important because this article contains the only substantial thing that the league could do without the concurrence of the representatives of the United States in the council or assembly.

Let us determine definitely the effect of this obligation and what it means. In all matters of dispute in which the United States is not a party it pledges us not to go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendation of the report of the council, and to which our representative in the council has assented. Reports upon disputed matters to which we are not a party must, whether referred to the council or the assembly, have the concurrence of our representatives.

Thus in all such cases we are amply protected. In those disputes referred to the council to which the United States is a party, and in which cases her representative and those of the other parties are precluded from acting, we pledge ourselves that if all the other members of the council concur in a report we will not go to war with any party to the dispute that complies with the recommendations of the report. It means if the report is favorable to us, and the other party complies with the recommendation, we will not make war. It means if the report is unfavorable to us, if made with the unanimity previously mentioned, we will not go to war against any party accepting the recommendations of the report. It should be noted that the obligation is not to engage in war under these circumstances. This is the full extent of our undertaking. We agree that we will not go to war concerning a disputed matter upon which four-fifths of the world has decided our contention was wrong. Reckless, indeed, would be the Government of a people which would hurl them into all the hazards of war in defiance practically of the public opinion of the world. Such a venture, if made, could only end in disaster. An agreement not to resort to war under circumstances like these is honorable, founded on prudence and wisdom. The people who bear all the sacrifices and burdens have no desire to undergo the horrors of war in the prosecution of doubtful rights and with the chances of success remote. This agreement, far from being a prejudicial fetter upon nations, is a most beneficial restraint, and will tend to save them from many reckless and disastrous wars. Under this article any disputed matter may be referred to the assembly for action, either by the council or by any party to the dispute, which can have it referred on request 14 days after the submission. The action and powers of the assembly are practically the same as those of the council, and what has been previously stated regarding disputed matters referred to the council would apply with equal force to those referred to the assembly. It should be noted in this connection that if the dispute is claimed by either party and is found by the council to be a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council is prohibited from making any recommendations as to its settlement. Domestic matters are excluded from the jurisdiction of the league, or action either by the council or assembly. Immigration, by all text writers on international law and by all Governments, has been considered and treated solely as a domestic question. In the absence of treaties, the municipal law of the country determines absolutely the admission of foreign citizens into the country. This has never been disputed. Vattel, the great authority upon international law, clearly states the law upon this subject, as follows:

> It is an accepted maxim of international law that every sovereign nation has the power as inherent in sovereignty and essential to self-preservation to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the Chinese exclusion case held that the power of the Government of the United States to exclude foreigners from the country whenever in its judgment the public interest required such exclusion has been asserted in repeated instances and can neither be granted away nor restrained by treaty.

Secretary of State Frelinghuysen in 1882 stated in a letter to Mr. Stillman:

> This Government can not contest the right of foreign Governments to exclude on police or other grounds American citizens from their shores.

The only way that immigration into this country could ever go to the league for consideration or action would be in a dispute regarding the interpretation of a treaty that we made with some nation upon that question. Without the existence of such a treaty the league is debarred from all jurisdiction. We have full power to revoke any treaty made involving immigration. Thus it is left for us to determine whether this question shall ever receive consideration by the league.

Mr. President, in order to make effective the undertakings made by the members of the league, all of which are promotive of peace, it is absolutely necessary that there should be in the covenant a sanction to enforce their observance. Unless this is done, honorable nations which comply with their obligations would be at a great disadvantage over faithless ones which ruthlessly ignore national promises. The covenant would hold the honorable as with bands of iron. Without a sanction it would hold the faithless only with paper bonds, to be snapped as caprice or interest might dictate. A sanction is needed to make the league a living, vital force to insure the peace of the world. To obtain observance of municipal law a sanction with varying penalties is indispensable. It is equally indispensable to secure compliance with the obligations assumed in this covenant. This sanction is contained in article 16, as follows:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.
> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.
>
> The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.
> Any member of the league which has violated any covenant of the league may be declared to be no longer a member of the league by a vote of the council, concurred in by the representatives of all the other members of the league represented thereon.

The substance of this article is that if a member of the league should violate its promise not to resort to war until the disputed matter has been submitted either to arbitration or the council, or three months after the award or report of the council, or violate its promise not to resort to war against any member of the league that complies with the award or recommendations of the council made with the unanimity as previously stated, then the other members of the league will direct against this covenant-breaking member an economic, financial, and commercial blockade, mutually supporting each other in such measures. It should be noted that this economic boycott is only invoked against a nation which has precipitated war contrary to its undertakings or under circumstances which would indicate that it was not justified. The members of the league refuse to be commercially neutral in a war ruthlessly begun by one of its members against another. It will refuse to have any trade relations whatsoever with the offending member. Many believe that this is the most effective means that can be invoked to prevent war. With no access to the markets of the world, either to sell or purchase, a nation engaged in such war would soon collapse. The knowledge that at the commencement of war it would be subjected to these destroying hardships would restrain the most resolute of nations from making the venture. A Government seeking to plunge into war with this threat hanging over it would find combined against it its own national agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial enterprises. Many modern wars have been occasioned by a desire for trade and commercial expansion. This character of war will cease when it is known that its inception will mark the destruction of trade and commerce. This provision is most potential for the prevention of war. It is far more preferable to endure the losses and inconveniences incident to a cessation of trade than to suffer all the horrors and the immense destruction of life and property incident to war.

The members of the league further agree "to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league." As all the covenants of the league are mutual among its members, this means that we permit troops to pass through our territory to enforce agreements to which we ourselves are parties. Certainly no serious objection can be urged to an undertaking of this character.

Mr. President, these constitute the direct obligations assumed by the members of the league under this article. The method of applying force against the covenant-breaking member is as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

The procedure under this provision is for the council to recommend to the several Governments against which the covenant-breaking member is waging war the military and naval forces to be furnished severally by the members of the league. The recommendations of the council must be unanimous. As nothing else is provided for either the council or assembly to do in this case, and as these are the only instrumentalities through which the league can take action, it seems that the several Governments affected are left to obtain the armaments recommended as best they can. They can only present the recommendations to the several Governments of the members of the league for consideration and action. The recommendations are only effective when supported by the Governments. The members of the league assume no obligation that these recommendations, when presented, will be ratified by their Governments.

Thus before the military or naval forces of the United States could be used under this article the representative of the United States upon the council must recommend their use and Congress sanction it. This insures that our Army and Navy will not engage in war where we have no vital interest and where we have assumed no legal or moral obligations. These recommendations, when made, will address themselves to the judgment of Congress and be disposed of as the honor and interest of the United States may demand. While the conduct of the covenant-breaking member is declared to be an act of war against all the members, it should be remembered that an act of war by one party is not necessarily war, and that war can only come to this country by a specific declaration of the same by Congress. Germany committed acts of war against us prior to its declaration by Congress. But war between the United States and Germany only began when so declared by Congress.

Mr. President, so desirous is the league of preventing wars and obtaining the settlement of international disputes without resorting to force that it also undertakes to settle disputes between a member of the league and a nation that is not a member of the league, or between nations neither of whom is a member of the league. This is accomplished by inviting such nations to become members of the league for the purpose of ending such dispute "upon such conditions as the council may deem just." The conditions imposed by the council must have the unanimous concurrence of all the members, hence in such cases must be assented to by our representatives upon the council. If such invitation is accepted, the procedure and the provisions for settling disputes between members referred to the council apply "with such modification as may be deemed necessary by the council." The council must be unanimous in making these modifications, and hence require the approval of our representative upon the council. I have already fully discussed the provisions of the covenant regarding disputes between members of the league which apply substantially in these cases, hence will not burden the Senate with a repetition. It is also provided:

> Upon such invitation being given the council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

The recommendation of the council must be unanimous, and hence be approved by our representative upon the council. This action of the council is a recommendation made to the members of the league for the consideration and action of their several Governments. It also provides:

> If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a member of the league, the provisions of article 16 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

It should be noted that this provision applies only to those cases where an outside State resorts to war under such circumstances against a member of the league. I have already fully discussed the effects of the economic blockade and the provisions of article 16, and will not weary the Senate by a further presentation of them as applied to these cases, which are similar. It is further provided:

> If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute the council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and result in the settlement of the dispute.

This action of the council must be unanimous, and hence have the approval of our representative upon the council. The council is herein officially authorized to use its good offices to prevent hostilities and effect a settlement of the dispute. It can make recommendations either to the parties to the dispute or to the several members of the league. The council is only authorized to act diplomatically in advising under this provision, as it has no armies, no navies, under its control; hence it can not wage war. It can not declare war. It may recommend war to the members of the league. They assume no obligations except when an outside nation wantonly attacks a member of the league, as previously stated.

It is believed that the extension of the privileges of the league to outside nations, to be used for the settlement of their disputes, will work for peace and harmony and be the cause of the prevention of many wars. It is believed that States for various reasons not members of the league will willingly avail themselves of its instrumentalities for settling questions which threaten war. It would be fortunate to have an organized body like the league's council, composed of the representatives of the freest, fairest, and most enlightened and peaceful governments, to which nations can with safety and confidence carry for settlement their disturbing differences. Many a war which has desolated the world would have been averted if such a body had existed. Its creation as provided in this covenant marks a great advance along the pathways of peace and justice.

Mr. President, another most commendable feature of this covenant is the portion relating to the colonies and territories which, as a consequence of the war, have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them. These, instead of being parceled out among the victorious Allies as spoils of conquest, engendering dissensions and enmities promotive of future wars, and in disregard of the rights and interests of the people concerned, are held as a sacred trust for civilization and are to be administered for the betterment of the inhabitants of the several countries. This is accomplished by selecting as mandatories suitable nations willing to undertake the responsibility of tutelage for these people and performing their tasks under the supervision and direction of the league. It is worded:

> The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatories shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the league, be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

The action of the council must be unanimous. Thus the scope and conditions of each mandatory must have either our approval in the ratification of this treaty or the approval of our representative in the council. The requirement of our assent will stand as a barrier against colonial exploitation and oppression. It will enable us to have accorded to the people of these countries the splendid colonial policies which we conferred upon Hawaii, the Philippines, and Porto Rico, and which have produced wonderful development and progress. It will enable America, where independence sprang from resistance to colonial wrongs, to restrain in the future the hand of colonial oppression. America, the first and stanchest friend of colonial rights, will have her sphere of usefulness enlarged.

Article 23 contains what liberal statesmen and philanthropists have for years sought to secure—the cooperation of nations upon certain vital matters which the individual action of nations is inadequate successfully to handle. The members of the league undertake, in accordance with the provisions of international conventions agreed upon, to endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children; to undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants on territories under their control; to intrust the league with general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; to provide and maintain freedom of communication and of transit, and for equitable treatment of the commerce of all members of the league; to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

These are existing world evils which can only be remedied by international cooperation and action. It is sought to extend a betterment to labor the world over. It endeavors to remove the danger which ever threatens well-paid labor in liberal and civilized countries like America when brought in competition with the low-priced labor of nations less free and advanced. It removes the danger not by reducing the high-priced labor, as advocated by the exploiting selfish, to the level of the low paid but by increasing the low paid to higher, thus benefiting all. If this is accomplished, the products of American labor will find fairer and broader opportunities in all the markets of the world. American labor and American industries will no longer be overshadowed by the peril of cheap pauper labor. Labor conditions, labor remuneration, will have a world improvement. Thus we understand why the toiling masses in all countries so earnestly favor this league, not only because it will save them from the burdens and sacrifices of war but because around it cluster their fondest hopes of general and permanent betterment. To many an oppressed native population this league will bring relief and reform, break many fetters, and illumine their skies with the light of a new and better day.

The infamous traffickers in women and children will be punished in every clime and their nefarious business rendered most difficult. Many a helpless woman will be saved from the purveyor of vice and shame. The use of opium and dangerous drugs will be far better controlled and regulated, and the curse of this evil to mankind lessened. National cooperation will be promptly and efficiently invoked for the prevention and spread of disease, and the world will not be scourged in the future, as it has been in the past, by the spread of dangerous and contagious maladies. Nations will not have to stand helpless, as in the past, and see brought to their shores the contagion of death. The science and energies of the world will be mobilized to destroy and circumscribe the disease at its inception.

By according equitable treatment to the commerce of all members of the league, securing for them freedom of communication and transit, wars occasioned by commercial discrimination and by prohibition of access to the seas will be prevented. This will remove one of the most fertile sources of the wars of the past. Besides, this will greatly facilitate and increase foreign trade and commerce. This will be most advantageous to the United States. We have firmly established our primacy in foreign commerce. For many years our exports have far exceeded those of any other nation. Our future prosperity is inseparably interwoven with our foreign trade. This provision will be most potential in its future expansion and development.

Thus, Mr. President, this article of the covenant carries international cooperation further than ever before attempted upon subjects where most needed and where international concert is almost indispensable and will ultimately result in manifold benefits to the members of the league.

Mr. President, another admirable feature of this league, which gives it a great superiority over all others previously formed, is the power of amendment. This makes it a vital, growing organism. It enables the league to meet changing conditions, permitting it to eliminate what experience has proven wrong and add to it what is desirable. The requirement of regular meetings of the council and assembly will keep it from languishing and dying from indifference and inactivity. Yet the method of effecting amendment affords ample protection to the United States. Article 26 provides:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

Thus no amendment can be made without the approval of the Government of the United States, which will consist of the concurrence of the President and two-thirds of the Senate. We possess an absolute veto power in this respect. Thus we need have no apprehension that amendments will be adopted prejudicial to our best interest. American safety in this respect is firmly secured.

Another great benefit that will accrue from this league is the abolition of secret treaties. All treaties, conventions, and international agreements must be registered and published. Until registered with the secretariat of the league they are not binding. Frank, open, honest diplomacy is substituted for the secret and intriguing diplomacy of the past. No longer will nations live under perpetual apprehension that secret conspiracies have been or are being formed to their detriment; no longer can compacts for spoliation be secretly made and delayed in execution for a favorable time to consummate the robbery; no longer can governments destitute of character enter, as has frequently been done in the past, into secret conflicting treaties with other governments and later betray the one from which the greatest advantage can be derived. Such despicable practices will be relegated to the past, and a new, open, honorable diplomacy inaugurated. The people will be thoroughly acquainted with the obligations to which their government commits them, and hence ultimately all diplomacy will be under the control of the people of the several governments. This will work for peace and for fair, honorable engagements. The secret brood of war conspirators will be destroyed.

Mr. President, the opponents of the league contend that if the United States should enter the league as proposed in the first draft she would by so doing abandon the Monroe doctrine, which has ever been her traditional foreign policy. They have insisted that this doctrine was so important that it should be reserved by explicit declaration. The new draft does this. Article 21 provides:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

Yet, Mr. President, with the clear, explicit reservation some of the opponents of the league are not satisfied. They do not like it being termed "a regional understanding for the securing of peace." It seems to me, Mr. President, the terms of description are apt and amply sufficient. It expressly declares that the Monroe doctrine, and hence all it implies, is not affected by this covenant. It remains unimpaired. Every right possessed by us under this doctrine prior to agreeing to this covenant would continue without diminution. If by possibility any conflict should arise between the provisions of the covenant and the Monroe doctrine, as far as we are concerned the provisions of the covenant are annulled and the Monroe doctrine survives for us as a living foreign policy. We accept the covenant with this clear reservation. This great doctrine may properly be described as a "regional understanding." It embraces in its scope North and South America; it encircles with its protecting arms this vast region. When announced by President Monroe in his message of December 2, 1823, it was clearly and explicitly limited to these two continents. It has never sought extension from the Western Hemisphere. The Monroe doctrine is more than a mere declaration of policy by President Monroe or Congress; it is a clear understanding by us and the world what we will do with all our power under certain circumstances. It was a clear understanding to the German Emperor when at our protest he abandoned his enterprise to seize Venezuela; it was a clear understanding to Great Britain when at the request of President Cleveland she consented to refer the question of disputed territory with Venezuela to arbitration; it became a clear understanding to the French Emperor when at our demand he withdrew his troops from Mexico and left Maximilian to his fate. The Monroe doctrine is also a clear understanding to the effect that as a matter of self-defense it will permit no foreign nations to acquire new territory and establish themselves in regions near us, if by so doing they would become a source of danger to us. Thus it prohibits the acquisition, directly or indirectly, by the consent or without the consent of Mexico, of lands in Mexico by a non-American power to be used or capable of being used as a base to threaten or attack us. Self-defense is an inalienable right superior to municipal law or covenants and one of the main foundations upon which the Monroe doctrine reposes. That this contention is true is clearly illustrated in the case of Yucatan. The governmental authorities of that country offered to transfer the "dominion and sovereignty" of that country to the United States and at the same time made a similar offer to Great Britain and Spain. With reference to the offer, President Polk, in a special message to Congress on April 29, 1848, said:

> Whilst it is not my purpose to recommend the adoption of any measure with a view to the acquisition of the "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan, yet according to our established policy we could not consent to a transfer of this "dominion and sovereignty" to either Great Britain or Spain, or any other European power. In the language of President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, "we would consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere dangerous to our peace and safety."

The Monroe doctrine can properly be described as an understanding for securing peace. No war has yet been waged for its maintenance. The understanding of it and all it implies has been a great source of peace and has prevented innumerable wars, for behind it to restrain unscrupulous aggressors has stood the vast power and resources of the United States.

President Roosevelt in his annual message of 1901, in speaking of the Monroe doctrine, said, "It is simply a step and a long step toward assuring the universal peace of the world by securing the possibility of permanent peace on this hemisphere." He distinctly limits the doctrine to the Western Hemisphere and commends it for securing the maintenance of peace.

Thus, Mr. President, not only is the Monroe doctrine fully preserved and protected by name in this covenant, but it is given new force and new dignity. We obtain by this covenant practically a world's recognition of our right to insist upon its maintenance as our fully understood foreign policy.

Mr. President, I have endeavored fully and dispassionately to present my conclusions regarding the proposed league of nations. I have enumerated the great advantages which would accrue to the United States and humanity by the adoption of this sane and reasonable plan to secure the peace of the world and prevent the recurrence of another horrible World War. I have shown that the benefits clearly obtained by this Nation will exceed any possible burden that might be imposed. I have proven that the plan of organization and operation will afford to this country every needed means of protection. I have pointed out how causes which have produced wars in the past are removed by this covenant. I have indicated how this covenant will inevitably tend to create comity among the various nations, give better international understandings and fairer international dealings. I have the firm conviction that it is one of the world's greatest documents, marking the beginning of a new and better order in world affairs, separating a past dark with war and strife from the sunlight of a future bright with peace and international cooperation and conciliation. Out of the Revolutionary War, won by American valor and sacrifice, emerged the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, the two most precious parchments yet conceived by human mind. The Constitution when proposed was assailed with virulence and encountered prophecies of dreadful calamities to follow its adoption exceeding anything that has been directed against the covenant. Yet the prophets of evil were routed by the calm judgment and patriotism of the people, the Constitution survived the terrific assault, and is to-day universally acclaimed the best scheme of government ever devised and furnished the prototype for all federated governments.

Out of this terrible and prolonged war, whose terrific gloom is only illuminated by a heroism and sacrifice unparalleled, emerges this league of nations to make complete and continuous the great victory won. This league will also survive the vicious attack of these new prophets of evil, and will, as it generously distributes with each receding year its increasing blessings to mankind, be known as the world's great charter of peace.

Mr. President, the pathway of our duty is plain. We should neither hesitate nor halt, but firmly align ourselves with the forces that are working for world betterment. With strong arms and brave hearts let us faithfully discharge our responsibilities as the world's greatest power and fearlessly face a future which beckons us to a greater glory and usefulness. Let us not be frightened by our own prodigious shadow as it projects itself in world affairs. Let us not be deterred from our manifest duty and destiny by a craven fear of becoming great in giving service and direction to a world in the direst hour of its need and distress.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood that the Senator did not wish to be interrupted during his speech, but would answer any questions after his speech was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. The questions I desire to ask are not put in any hostile mood, but to obtain the opinion of the Senator on certain provisions of the league.

Mr. SWANSON. I will be very glad to answer the Senator's questions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Article 21 provides:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

Is it the opinion of the Senator that the Monroe doctrine is thereby excepted from the jurisdiction of the league of nations?

Mr. SWANSON. I am satisfied that it is, and I so stated in my speech.

Mr. KELLOGG. If that is the proper construction, can there be any objection to the Senate making that statement in its ratification?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know but that it might delay the ratification of the treaty. I am not prepared to say now until I come to a further consideration of that feature, but I am satisfied that where by name, clearly and distinctly, the Monroe doctrine is reserved and the world understands it and what it implies it is reserved to the United States by name.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not now disputing what the Senator says, but I am simply asking if that is the proper construction to be placed upon the clause, can there be any harm in the Senate so stating in its ratification?

Mr. SWANSON. I can not say what effect it would have upon the treaty and what delay it might occasion in the final operation of the treaty. Hence I would not desire to commit myself.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask one more question. Was the Monroe doctrine established or has it been established by any international engagement, or is it an American declaration of principle which we enforce for our protection?

Mr. SWANSON. I think it is a public declaration of principle and that there is a clear understanding in the world as to what we will do under certain circumstances. The world seems to understand it pretty well.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator please refer me to any treaty or international engagement recognizing the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. SWANSON. I know of none. "International engagements" I presume would refer to other treaties.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is, the Senator understands that this is an international understanding because we have announced it and the other nations understand we have announced it. Is that it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not an international understanding, but a regional understanding.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not disputing what the Senator says. I am simply asking for the basis of his statement. The article reads:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or—

Then we might say, "such as"— > regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine.

That may not be the proper reading. If this is the correct construction, the Monroe doctrine is defined as an international engagement. But we will pass that. I should like to ask one or two more questions.

Referring to article 15, the clause which the Senator discussed a few moments ago:

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

Did I understand the Senator to say that the right of the United States to exclude foreigners could not be contracted away by treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Chinese exclusion cases held that to make a covenant to that effect, such action by Congress would be a repeal of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. That Congress may violate the treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. Congress can annul the treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. Congress may violate a treaty by denouncing it, but has not the Supreme Court time and time again held that a treaty fixing the right of foreign citizens to come to this country, to own or inherit real estate and to engage in business is valid?

Mr. SWANSON. The Supreme Court held in the case of the Chinese treaty excluding them that where that is done the treaty is annulled and that you can not make covenants binding upon Congress with reference to the question of immigration.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not the holding of the Supreme Court this, that a treaty is the supreme law of the land until set aside by act of Congress?

Mr. SWANSON. That is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Therefore a treaty would be valid which provided that foreign subjects may enter this country, until Congress set aside the treaty or enact a law prohibiting such immigration.

Mr. SWANSON. The treaty must be constitutional, like any act of Congress.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true, but such a treaty has been held to be constitutional.

Mr. SWANSON. In the Chinese exclusion cases, if I remember correctly, though I have not read them lately, it was decided that the treaty-making power could not make a covenant which would preclude Congress from controlling immigration.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly not; Congress could violate the treaty by excluding them.

Mr. SWANSON. If the treaty should contain such a provision, and Congress did not want them to come in, it could annul the treaty in that way.

Mr. KELLOGG. It could violate it.

Mr. SWANSON. It could annul it, and would be allowed to annul it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose, in a dispute between the United States and Japan, for illustration, the United States being one party and Japan the other, the council should hold that it was not a domestic question pure and simple, but that it was an international question in which Japan was interested, what would be the remedy of the United States?

Mr. SWANSON. Under a treaty pending?

Mr. KELLOGG. Under no pending treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. It would be absolutely a domestic question and so held by every nation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose the council should hold to the contrary? The United States is precluded from voting on that, because it is a party.

Mr. SWANSON. The council could not perpetrate an absolute fraud. The Senator knows full well it is an absolute fraud in a court to make a fraudulent decision, and clearly such a decision is not binding. If the contention of the whole world has been up to this time that immigration—though immigration is not named here—is solely a domestic question, then I have no doubt the council would promptly so find.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt that immigration, the tariff laws, coastwise traffic, duties, and all such things, are purely domestic questions, with which no foreign country should be concerned or have the right to interfere. I have no doubt of that myself.

Mr. SWANSON. They are, and they are absolutely excluded under this covenant.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, should they not be absolutely excluded from the consideration of the league?

Mr. SWANSON. I think they are.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, if that is the opinion of the Senator, then there is no objection to the Senate so stating, is there?

Mr. SWANSON. If the reservations come up, I will express my opinion on them when I see them.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is only one other question, I think, which I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia. Referring to article 10, as I understood the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the other day, it was his opinion that the recommendations of the council as to the means of carrying out article 10 are to be merely advisory and are not to be binding upon this country. Is that the opinion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. They are advisory and binding on the conscience and fair dealing and honesty of this country.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, but are they legally binding under this treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think they are legally binding. There is no necessity of advising anyone to act legally. The law does not advise a judge to act. The judge enters a decree and it becomes operative.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator from Virginia believe that there is a binding agreement under article 10 of the treaty under which this Government is bound to come to the assistance of any nation whose territorial integrity and political independence are threatened?

Mr. SWANSON. I said in my address, if the Senator had heard it——

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SWANSON. I stated that we entered into an agreement to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. That is an agreement. Then, as each case arises, it is left to the judgment and conscience and fair dealing of the political power or authority of each country to determine to what extent it is bound by its agreement under section 10 and the means by which it will enforce it.

Mr. KELLOGG. That answers my question. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not hear that part of his address.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] a question in order to get his view. Is the Senator of the opinion that the treaty contract could be changed by reservation as well as by amendment?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, a contract can not be changed by reservation or amendment without the consent of the other party to the contract, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. If in the resolution of ratification of the treaty reservations were adopted by the Senate in conflict with any of the terms of the treaty, it would, then, not be a ratification of the present treaty, would it?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the treaty would be ratified subject to that condition which could be accepted by each of the other countries, if it saw fit to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. But it would be a change in the contract if it were inconsistent with it?

Mr. KELLOGG. That would depend upon the nature of the reservation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I say if the reservation were inconsistent with any term of the treaty it would be a change, to that extent, of the treaty, would it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the reservation changes any of the substantial terms of the treaty, it is a change as to this country, and, of course, can be objected to by any other country; and must either be directly or tacitly accepted by that country.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, if there is any change in any terms of the treaty by reservation just as well as by amendment, then it is such a change of the contract that was entered into by the negotiators that it must go back to the other negotiators for their consent?

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, I will say to the Senator I think I have answered his question, but I will take occasion in the Senate, at the proper time, to explain my views upon reservations and amendments and the law applicable to both at greater length, if the Senator from Nevada will excuse me at the present time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, one other question and I will excuse the Senator. I take it now that the Senator from Minnesota agrees with the Senator from Nevada that any change in any terms of the contract brought about by the Senate through amendment or reservation is such a change in the whole contract as negotiated between the signatory powers as that it must again be consented to by the other powers who signed it?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Nevada may make that as his statement, but not as mine.

Mr. PITTMAN. I so understood the Senator; and the RECORD will stand for what he said. However, I do not think that the Senator in any speech that he will ever make—for he is too good a lawyer to do so—will take the position that the Senate may make any material change in a treaty that has been negotiated by our President with other countries and have it binding on any of the parties until it is consented to in its changed form.

Mr. KELLOGG. If we amended the treaty, to be sure, an amendment which changed the terms of the treaty must be accepted, like any amendment to a contract, by the other parties; but that does not extend to every reservation.

Mr. PITTMAN. But if the reservation——

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator desires to make his own statement, he can do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will explain my position on that subject fully.

Mr. PITTMAN. And I take it that the Senator makes no distinction between a reservation and an amendment if the effect is the same. The Senator being silent, I naturally conclude that is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Merely calling it a reservation or an amendment would not make any difference; the substance, of course, decides the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, another question. If the language of the contract is changed, it is not for the party changing it alone to determine the effect of the change, but the other party to the contract also has the right always to determine its effect. I do not think that can be denied. If we change the language of this contract by amendment or by reservation, we may not think that that change of language constitutes any change of substance, and yet, no matter what the change is, the other contracting parties must agree, as we agree, that it does not change the substance of the contract or that such change is agreeable. Otherwise it is not a contract. In other words, there is not a reservation or an amendment that we can place on this treaty that does not necessitate a renegotiation and reconsideration by every contracting power.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada can not put any such statement as that in my mouth or attribute it to me, for I entirely disagree with him.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nevada mean to say if this treaty were drawn in any shape in which we choose to draw it, changed in every line, changed in substance in every substantial provision, and was then deposited by the President of the United States in Paris and acted upon by either one of the other nations, although they might not affirmatively agree to the changes, that it would not be binding upon that nation?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from New Mexico is a lawyer, and he understands, as we all do, that a contract may be agreed to by consent or by a writing.

Mr. FALL. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. PITTMAN. But that is not all that the country wants to know. The country would not stand for one moment to have its rights trifled with in any such manner; it would not stand for one moment to have a contract written by the Senate and deposited anywhere under the belief that a certain delay in protesting against it or that lapse of time would give consent to it, when at any time a nation which was obligated to the United States under the treaty might arise and say, "We have never consented to such a change; we have never done anything that would bind us to such a change." In other words, this matter is of too vital importance to this country, as well as to the remainder of the world, for us to have anything but a definite understanding. We are not going to be bound by this treaty until we know that the other nations to whom we assume obligations are also bound by it. There is only one way to know it—not by silence, not by lapse of time, not by mailing it to somebody, not by depositing it somewhere, but by open, notorious assent to any changes that we make; and that is the only thing the President of the United States would accept, and it is the only thing that the Senate of the United States has a right to accept.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course I can not speak for the President of the United States as to what he would accept. I have known people to be compelled to accept things that they declared they would not accept; in other words, still insisting that they would never consent, I have known them to consent.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think, possibly, that will be true of some of the Senators.

Mr. FALL. I think so; I think that they would not even insist that they would not consent, but some of them would consent at once.

Mr. President, neither can I speak for the great people of the United States. I have read upon several occasions declarations that the President of the United States voiced the sentiments of the American people. In view of the fact that just prior to the last election the President said that unless this body had a Democratic majority, and unless the other body of this Congress had a Democratic majority, the world would look upon the results of the election as a repudiation of his foreign policy and it would hamper him in the conduct of his foreign policy, I am inclined to think that, at least upon some occasions, the President does not voice the sentiment of the people, and that if he were to accept the result of the issue which he himself made he would understand that the majority of the people of the United States do not approve of his foreign policy.

While I am willing, however, to listen to the President when he assumes to speak the voice of the American people, in view of the fact that he was elected two years ago as their spokesman, I must admit that I have not yet arrived at the conclusion that I must accept as the vox populi the voice of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber upon this proposition. So, when the Senator from Nevada undertakes to tell me that the people of the United States will not stand for this or will not stand for that or will not stand for the other, I say he is no more qualified, except by ability, to speak for the American people upon this subject than I myself am; and judging from the population of the State which the Senator so ably represents I should think that possibly the Senator from New York might be better qualified to voice the sentiment of the people of the United States.

However, this is mere persiflage. I resent somewhat the suggestion of the Senator that anyone here, upon this side at any rate—and I think I speak in that respect for the Republican side—or any of the other Senators here upon the other side are intending in any way whatsoever to trifle with this very grave question which is now confronting us. I presume that each one of us will act under his own sense of responsibility to the people; that he will not simply follow blindly any leader of a party or any man in power or out of power, but that he will listen to suggestions from any responsible and reliable source; that he will give mature deliberation to the question as it is presented to him, and will then, without reference to politics or to who is the President of the United States or to who negotiated this treaty, vote his convictions as he understands them. If those convictions as he expresses them are thereafter confirmed by the great voice of the American people, it will certainly be much to his gratification; I am sure it would be to myself; but to assume, as the Senator from Nevada assumes, following the footsteps of his able party leader, to voice the sentiment of the American people upon this floor upon this question is presumption; and I can not agree with it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, we were dealing with a legal question. I do not know that I said anything about the Senators on the other side; I think I never used that expression at all in my remarks. I was discussing the matter with one of the ablest lawyers of this body; I was not making a political speech. I stated that the country would not stand for that kind of trifling, because I assumed that I was talking to a lawyer. I am satisfied that there is no lawyer in this body who, while conscientiously representing a client, would change on behalf of his own client the terms of a contract that had already been signed without asking the other side whether they agreed to the change. I am satisfied that there is not a lawyer in this body who would make such a change in behalf of his own client, and trust to long consent to it being taken as binding the other side to the change. That is not the way in which conscientious, able, sincere lawyers act. That is the reason why I know the Senator from New Mexico would not act in that way, and that is why I know that if he did trifle with the question now before the Senate in the manner suggested the country would call him down, just as his client would call him down if, as an attorney in a civil cause, he should so act.

As to the other remarks of the Senator with regard to the petty matters he discussed, I do not arise here for the purpose of discussing those matters; I did not rise here for the purpose of injecting politics into the discussion, and I will not take the time to answer the Senator's insinuations. I arose for the very purpose, as questions were being asked by the Senator from Minnesota, to bring to a conclusion the purpose of his inquiry. That has been accomplished to my satisfaction. That is all I arose for. There is no question now that the other contracting parties have a right to construe the language as to whether it changes the treaty contract. There is no one here who would contend to the contrary, and I do not care whether the language of a contract be changed by reservation or by an amendment, then the other parties to the contract have a right to consider the new language and determine for themselves whether or not the contract has been changed; and if they say it has been changed, then they must agree to the change by formal act, or impliedly agree to the changed treaty by acting under it or accepting the benefits thereof. What would constitute acting under the treaty? What acts would constitute an acceptance of the benefits of the treaty? In the meantime what protection would our country have under the treaty? It must be evident that any change in the verbiage of the treaty, whether by amendment or reservation, must be submitted to the other parties to the treaty for consideration, approval, rejection, or amendment. This would mean dangerous delay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, something said by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] seemed to cast doubt upon the contention which I have repeatedly made upon the floor of the Senate, that public opinion on the league of nations is crystallizing overwhelmingly in its favor. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not, but I have repeatedly put into the RECORD conclusive evidence that every national organization that has spoken on this subject has spoken in favor of the league. I have also placed in the RECORD many other documents showing the state of public opinion, and I am not going to take the time of the Senate to add to that list now; but I ask to place in the RECORD the resolution adopted at Milwaukee on July 4 by the National Education Association of the United States, which represents 600,000 teachers, as showing the sentiment of the teachers of the United States on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 11, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: The National Education Association of the United States, at its Milwaukee meeting, July 4, adopted by practically a unanimous vote by the following resolution concerning the league of nations:

"One of the revelations brought to us out of the great World War is the knowledge that no country can preserve its ideals in isolation from the rest of the world. If our ideals of democracy and humanity are to continue, even for ourselves as an American people, it is essential that we establish with the other nations of the world such relations as will tend to preserve the peace of the world, demand from all nations the education of their people in the fundamental ideals and principles of good government, and secure for all peoples the opportunity to pursue their industries and commerce without interruption by unnecessary wars or interference because of the selfish ambitions of any one people or ruler.

"Therefore this association heartily approves the action of President Wilson in his support of the league of nations as a nonpartisan measure, designed to secure the peace and happiness of all people and the propagation and preservation of true democracy."

Very sincerely, yours,

GEORGE D. STRAYER,
President.
J. W. CRABTREE,
Secretary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask also to have printed in the RECORD the resolution adopted by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen at their second triennial convention, held in Columbus from May 14 to June 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen at second triennial convention held in Columbus May 14 to June 4.

Whereas the greatest armed conflict of history is over. It has been the bloodiest and most cruel and destructive war since the world began. Already we look back upon it as a horrible nightmare; and

Whereas people never voluntarily enter war, which is the result of misgovernment and comes as a lack of cooperation among nations; and

Whereas President Wilson and the learned representatives of our allies and the neutral countries have formulated a plan which we hope will bring about closer cooperation among nations with a view of avoiding future wars—the league of nations. Millions of mothers in the broken homes of the world are dreaming of it to-day. The spirits of 10,000,000 dead men, who but yesterday fell victims to the folly and criminal shortsightedness of man, are whispering their supplications into the ears of a just God that national butchery shall cease and war shall be no more: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Grand Lodge of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, in session assembled, go on record as in favor of the league of nations: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Member of Congress and a copy to President Wilson, in care of his Secretary at Washington, D. C.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. These, Mr. President, are simply additions to the long list of proofs which I have inserted in the RECORD. I ask some Senator on the other side, if he has any proof of public opinion contrary to the league of nations, to place it in the RECORD.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will undertake to call attention to something of that character in a day or two. If I had the time now in five minutes I could do so, but I have not the time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust the Senator will do so, and when he brings it in I will place my list against his, and I will guarantee that mine will be twenty times more significant.

Mr. FALL. And when I make my speech I will place in the RECORD the speech which the Senator made in this Chamber on the 7th day of March, 1912, with reference to just how this propaganda was being brought about, when he stated it was paid for by the Carnegie Peace Foundation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And when the Senator rises to do that, I shall state from my place upon the floor of the Senate that the Carnegie Peace Foundation has not spent one dollar in promoting propaganda for the league of nations, but is withholding its support from it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I, of course, will not enter into any controversy with the Senator until I bring my proofs here, when I will show him from the official statements of the League to Enforce Peace that the Carnegie Peace Foundation is behind it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I shall show the Senator that the League to Enforce Peace has not received a dollar from the Carnegie Peace Foundation for this purpose.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I add one word more, with the permission of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. FALL. I have no doubt the Senator from Nebraska is very familiar with the source from which the funds are derived in this case; I have none except of a negative character.

NEAR EAST RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to which I referred this morning for the incorporation of the Near East Relief Association. I may say that since this morning I have conferred with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and he finds no objection to the bill. I mention again the fact that it has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill; but I did not mean to convey the idea to the Senator from Iowa that I had no objection to the bill. I shall vote against the bill, but I have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I may have stated it a little broadly. The statement of the Senator from Utah to me was that he had no objection to the present consideration of the bill. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state what is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is now in existence, and has been for some time, a large association for the relief of the people of the Turkish Empire, mainly the Armenians. The Senator from Tennessee and all other Senators are familiar with the terrific suffering and the great want that exist in that part of the world. It has been found that the relief can be administered much more economically and much more effectively if the association through which it is administered is organized under a law of the United States, instead of being purely a voluntary association. The bill does not involve the contribution of one penny from the Treasury of the United States. It is entirely an altruistic effort to relieve some of the suffering that exists in that part of the world.

Mr. McKELLAR. It merely incorporates it under the Federal law.

Mr. CUMMINS. It merely incorporates it as a corporation of the District of Columbia. It is purely benevolent, and is very much needed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Government incur any obligation of any kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa for the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 180) to incorporate Near East Relief, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, namely, James L. Barton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Abram I. Elkus, Charles W. Eliot, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, Robert J. Cuddihy, Cleveland E. Dodge, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, their associates and successors duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of Near East Relief and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

SEC. 2. That the object for which said corporation is incorporated shall be to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas; to provide for the care of orphans and widows and to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute, or dependent directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control.

SEC. 3. That the direction and management of the affairs of the corporation, and the control of its property and funds, shall be vested in a board of trustees, to be composed of the following individuals: James L. Barton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Abram I. Elkus, Charles W. Eliot, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, Robert J. Cuddihy, Cleveland E. Dodge, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, who shall constitute the first board of trustees and constitute the members of the corporation. Vacancies occurring by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe, and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation or of the trustees and committees may be held in other places, such as the by-laws may from time to time fix.

SEC. 5. That the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated by the existing and unincorporated American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them or to such corporation, for the purposes of the trust; with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint officers, whether members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation, and at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may think proper; and full power to adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as may be necessary to secure the safe and convenient transaction of the business of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Abram I. Elkus, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, William B. Millar, George T. Scott, James L. Barton, and Charles V. Vickrey, or any six of them, at the Borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, by notice served in person or by mail, addressed to each trustee at his place of residence; and the said trustees named herein, or a majority thereof, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers, and generally to organize the said corporation.

SEC. 7. That a meeting of the incorporators, their associates, or successors shall be held once in every year after the year of incorporation at such time and place as shall be prescribed in the by-laws, when the annual reports of the officers and executve boards shall be presented and members of the executive board elected for the ensuing year. Special meetings of the corporation may be called upon such notice as may be prescribed.

SEC. 8. That a copy of the constitution and by-laws and of all amendments thereto shall be filed with the Congress when adopted, and on or before the 1st day of April each year said corporation shall make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including in such report the names and residences of its officers, and a full and itemized account of all receipts and expenditures.

SEC. 9. That the corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or declare or pay any dividends, or otherwise distribute to its members any of its property, or the proceeds therefrom, or from its operations. On dissolution of the corporation otherwise than by act of Congress the property shall escheat to the United States.

SEC. 10. That all members and officers of the corporation and of its governing body may reside in or be citizens of any place within the United States.

SEC. 11. That the franchise herein granted shall terminate at the expiration of 25 years from the date of the approval of the act; and that Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think all Americans heartily approve of the objects sought by those who are asking for a charter from Congress and are grateful for the splendid work which has been accomplished by the philanthropic and patriotic Americans named in this bill in the Near East, and particularly in Armenia. The work which the men named in this bill and other philanthropic Americans have performed for the relief of the Armenians deserves the highest praise, and I should be reluctant to offer any impediment to the work which they contemplate performing in the future. The situation in Armenia is so deplorable as to excite the sympathies of all people. The people of the United States have been called upon to make generous contributions to alleviate the suffering there existing, and some legal organization or instrumentality is needed in order to properly carry out the wishes of those who are so generously contributing for the salvation of the starving and suffering Armenians.

While applauding the altruism and benevolence of those engaged in this great work, I have objected to this bill, as I have objected to other bills that have come before the Judiciary Committee that created special corporations by special and private Federal acts. There is a general incorporation act, applicable to the District of Columbia, and there is no real or valid reason why resort is not had to this law. The persons named in the pending bill could incorporate under the laws of the District of Columbia, or, if they preferred, they could organize under the laws of some State. I am not aware of any power upon the part of the Federal Government to grant special charters for private undertakings or to enact general incorporation laws for private business pursuits. The Federal Government has a right, of course, to grant charters to organizations that are employed for governmental purposes; but I do not think it is the function, nor is it within the power of the Federal Government, to grant charters to private individuals to engage in private work, although that work may be charitable and benevolent. The Federal Government is one of limited and enumerated powers; it is not within the power of the Federal Government to give charters to individuals to carry on local banks or manufacturing institutions or to engage in charitable and philanthropic activities.

It may not create corporations to operate within the States and to engage in purely private business. The States under their clear and undoubted authority may authorize the formation of corporations or partnerships; they may prescribe the conditions under which artificial persons, such as corporations, may exist and operate. But the authority of the National Government is entirely different.

It should not and it can not validly create corporations to engage in the usual business of the ordinary corporation.

It may organize a company to perform some governmental function. It may provide for the organization of fiscal agencies when their functions are related to the Government and are deemed to be for its welfare and as essential to the discharge of its proper functions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment in order that I may reply to a suggestion he has just made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I understand the standpoint of the Senator from Utah, and, generally speaking, I think it is right and sound, but the Congress of the United States has the same power specially to incorporate a corporation of the District of Columbia that it has to enact the general law under which individuals can incorporate themselves as a corporation of the District of Columbia. I think the Senator from Utah will admit the correctness of that proposition.

Mr. KING. I was coming to that Mr. President. I think I assent, if I understand the Senator from Iowa, to the last suggestion made by him. I was about to say that an effort has been made to differentiate this bill from other bills that have come before the Judiciary Committee, where the plan was to secure a Federal charter without reference to the District of Columbia and the authority of Congress to legislate for it, but solely upon the theory that Congress could rightfully create by special act a corporation to operate anywhere within or without the United States and for purely private purposes. It is possible that there is a distinction between an act which grants a Federal charter to A, B, and C for the purpose of engaging in a certain business, and one which authorizes them as a corporation within the District of Columbia to do the same thing; yet I confess to a feeling of dizziness and uncertainty when I undertake to follow the distinction. This is a measure creating a private corporation by special act of Congress, and the corporation can not be said to be under general law, or referable to general law, because the act creating it says that it is under or within the District of Columbia. The individuals asking for this charter undoubtedly believe that a Federal charter will give them a prestige and a standing that they would not enjoy if they incorporated under some State law or incorporated under the Federal incorporation act of the District of Columbia. They are not willing to avail themselves of the many avenues open to them to incorporate. They decline to secure a charter from a State or to avail themselves of the general act of the District. Apparently they are not so much concerned in having a legal entity, a corporation enjoying the privileges and advantages which would follow—as in securing some advantage from the claim that they are a governmental organization or an arm of the Government—a creation of Congress called into existence by special act.

A number of the gentlemen who are interested in this matter—and they are all admirable men—have spoken to me and have sought to abate any opposition that I might have to the bill by referring to the worthy objects lying back of it, and I have freely conceded that the objects were of the highest purpose. As I understand the position of these splendid men, it was that a Federal charter would give standing and prestige to this organization; that the organization would come in contact more or less with representatives of other nations; and if it were known that it was chartered by the Congress of the United States it would enjoy to a greater or less degree the prestige of a Federal agency and would be regarded as an arm or instrumentality of the Government, and its officers and representatives would receive greater consideration. I can well understand how peoples abroad would not look into the legal questions involved, and would assume that a corporation acting under a charter from the United States was an agency of the Federal Government and its officers were representatives of that Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that it could be or ever would be contended that it is an agency of the Federal Government; but if the representation of the fact, which is that it is a corporation chartered by act of Congress, will make the association more effective, if it can administer more relief, if it can help humanity a little more because it is incorporated by Congress than otherwise, why should it not be done, for surely there never was greater need than now for help of this character in the particular region to which this bill applies?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I assent to the latter part of the statement of my distinguished friend. My sympathies have been aroused, as have the sympathies of all Americans for many years, over the condition of the people of Armenia. The atrocities inflicted upon them, the brutalities to which they have been subjected by Turkey, have excited the indignation of the civilized world; and I think I may say without successful challenge that the American people with practical unanimity feel that Turkey's power ought to be broken and destroyed forever; that she should be driven from Europe and no longer exercise authority over Armenia and her oppressed and bleeding people. And all concur that there should be succor and relief carried to these suffering people. But that is not the only question that we are considering now.

I do not quite agree with the implication of my distinguished friend that we ought to permit an organization, no matter how benevolent or worthy the object of the organization is, to trade upon the fact that it is a Federal corporation. By that I mean that when laws exist under which corporations may be formed we ought not to incorporate them by special act of Congress in order that they may possess superior standing and prestige, no matter how beneficent the objects may be for which they were organized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the power which I hope we are about to exercise were beyond our authority under the Constitution, I would agree with the Senator from Utah entirely; but it is not beyond our authority under the Constitution. We have a right to exercise this power. Now, if in incorporating this association we signify to the world that Congress realizes the hopeless and helpless condition of the people over there, and that it really is a message of sympathy as well as a message of relief to these oppressed and tortured men and women and children, why should we not exercise some part of our constitutional power to make the world understand that we want to give these people all the relief which the charity and benevolence of the people of the United States are willing to give them?

I can not understand why we should not and could not and can not do that with the greatest propriety.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its undoubted power, some years ago passed a law for the organization of private corporations within the District of Columbia. I concede that the Congress of the United States has the power to legislate over and with respect to the District of Columbia. It may treat it as territory belonging to and under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, in the same manner that it legislates with respect to Territories. Indeed, it may go further and it has greater power perhaps than it has over Territories. Congress, out of the public domain, carves Territories, such as Arizona and New Mexico and others that have now become States, and it legislates with respect to those Territories; but when they become States its power with respect to them is entirely different.

It was the duty of Congress to enact a general incorporation statute to meet the private business and industrial needs of those residing within the District of Columbia and those who desired to do business within the District. This duty was performed and a satisfactory and liberal statute was passed. But this law is ignored by the proponents of this bill; they seek a special act, and ask Congress to exercise powers which a State might possess.

Congress, if it did not question its power to create by special act private corporations, did determine that it was unwise to pursue this course, and thereupon enacted a general incorporation act, under which individuals might form corporations in the District of Columbia. Those seeking the charter provided by this bill may resort to that act, as other individuals have resorted to it, and they may form a corporation having powers adequate and competent for the discharge of the duties and the achievement of the objects which are sought to be accomplished in the bill now under consideration.

Even if it be conceded that this proposed legislation is within the power of the Federal Government, that it is not a Federal charter in the sense that we would grant a charter aside from and outside of the District of Columbia, but that it is tied to the District of Columbia and is legislation in its behalf, and is referable to its power to pass a general incorporation act for the District of Columbia, still I insist that it is unwise to grant a special charter. States long ago discovered the impropriety of granting special charters, either for municipal corporations or for private corporations. General statutes providing for corporations contain provisions for dealing with them. Their powers are defined, the manner of supervision is set forth, and the manner of their dissolution is prescribed. But corporations specially created must be dealt with differently. Here Congress would have to exercise visitorial powers, and quite likely only by special act of Congress could the charter be revoked.

I think that special charters are unwise and improper, and certainly can not be defended where no necessity therefor exists. However, I do not think this charter can be referred to the general power which the Government has to legislate with respect to incorporations in the District of Columbia. This will be called a special charter granted by Congress, not in connection with the District of Columbia, but as an independent grant of power; and in that view I deny the power of the Federal Government to grant the charter or to enact this legislation.

I shall content myself with voting against the bill, but shall offer no obstacle to its immediate consideration.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the Senator to take the position that the Congress has no power to pass such an act of incorporation. Is it not true that the Congress has, in numerous instances before, passed acts of incorporation somewhat similar in principle to this, so that if this passes it will in no sense constitute a precedent in the first instance? There are numerous precedents existing of acts passed exactly in the class with this act. Is not that true?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator is right. The Senator will recall that he served upon a committee that investigated the National German-American Alliance. That organization existed in virtue of a special charter granted by the Congress of the United States; and I think I do not misconceive the view of the Senator when I say that it was his opinion—I know it was mine—that that was a very unwise thing for Congress to have done, even though the Senator may not believe that Congress did not have the power to do that thing.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; I quite concede that it was an unwise thing for the Congress to have done, because of the event, the outcome. My recollection is that the American Red Cross was incorporated by special act of Congress. In that I may be mistaken. It occurs to me that the purposes of the corporation which this bill seeks to create are quite similar to the purposes of the American Red Cross.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I grant that there are a number of precedents for legislation of this character; and yet I feel sure that the Senator, belonging to the same school of political thought to which I belong, will agree with me that the Federal Government was not organized for the purpose of granting private charters to individuals to carry on enterprises and industries and charitable and philanthropic undertakings; that the power of the Federal Government to grant charters is limited to those charters that relate to governmental purposes and in the execution of governmental functions. Congress would have the power to grant a charter for a Federal bank, for some fiscal agency of the Government; that would be serving a national and a Federal purpose; but it would not have the power to grant a charter for the purpose of carrying on some manufacturing plant or industry or for the purpose of engaging in some charitable or philanthropic work.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when I rose awhile ago and asked the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to explain the provisions of the bill, I did not do so for the purpose of objecting to this particular bill. I did not know that this bill had been reported, and did not know what it was, and wanted to know before it was actually voted on. I have since seen the bill and examined it, and wish to say that I am heartily in favor of it. I believe it is a very proper measure.

I want to read from the second section of the bill, showing its object:

> That the object for which said corporation is incorporated shall be to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas; to provide for the care of orphans and widows and to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute, or dependent directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control.

It appears from this bill that a number of philanthropic men have organized themselves together for the purpose of aiding principally the Armenians, the people in the Near East. To my mind, it is a most desirable thing. It is a most desirable way of managing this particular kind of a charity, because that is what it is. It is much better than if the Government undertook it. It is better in every way; and it seems to me that the Government should give it its approval and its backing, as far as that may be.

These people do not ask anything of the Government. They do not ask the Government to contribute. The Government is not obligated to do anything except to give a general charter to the corporation which is to be organized. The reason for the organization or interpretation is perfectly apparent from section 5, of which I read just a short part:

> That the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated by the existing and unincorporated American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them or to such corporation, for the purposes of the trust.

We all know from common experience that usually matters of this kind can be handled better by a corporation than by an unincorporated society. The part that the Government is to play in it is distinctly set out in section 9, as follows:

> That the corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or declare or pay any dividends, or otherwise distribute to its members any of its property, or the proceeds therefrom, or from its operations. On dissolution of the corporation otherwise than by act of Congress the property shall escheat to the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the bill should pass, and pass unanimously. It is for a worthy purpose. It is for a purpose that the Government ought to be behind; and I hope it will so pass.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], in the eulogy which he has just passed upon the objects of the bill, utterly misconceives the position which has been taken by myself with respect to this measure. There is no question but that the purposes, as I stated, are worthy. I have the highest praise for the splendid work performed by the Christian men who have carried the banner of hope and help to the stricken peoples of Asia Minor. I know of the great work which they have done, and of the still greater work which they have in contemplation.

There is a great deal of difference between the objects of an organization and the organization itself, or the power to create the organization. I stated before, as I state now, that there ought to be an incorporation. This bill is of such a character as that a legal corporation ought to exist, rather than a voluntary association or a partnership, limited or otherwise. My contention is that the incorporation should be formed under the act of the District of Columbia, which is sufficiently broad and comprehensive for it to obtain all of the power which this bill gives, and all of the power that any organization should desire. If it were not desired to incorporate under the laws of the District of Columbia, then the organization could be effected under the incorporation act of any of the States of the Union.

My contention is that a direct charter by Congress, even for a worthy and a charitable purpose, is beyond the power of the Federal Government. The Federal Government has the right, in dealing with the District of Columbia, to authorize by general law the formation of corporations within the District of Columbia; and I concede that if this can be considered merely the exercise of that power, then undoubtedly this bill is constitutional. If it be a direct assertion of power, if it be in harmony with the theory of some that Congress may incorporate any organization for any purpose within the United States and clothe it with full authority to engage in private business, then I deny the power of the Federal Government to pass this or similar acts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ATLAS LUMBER CO. AND OTHERS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 715, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, after the bill is read, will the Senator make an explanation of it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 715) for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co., each of which companies furnished to Silas N. Opdahl, a failing Government contractor, certain building materials which were used in the construction of Burke Hall at the Pierre Indian School, in the State of South Dakota, as follows:

Whereas on the 26th day of July, 1911, Silas N. Opdahl entered into a contract with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the construction of a brick dormitory, known as Burke Hall, at the Pierre Indian School, at Pierre, S. Dak., for $30,200, without requiring a bond from said Opdahl for the protection of labor and material men, as required by the act of Congress of February 24, 1905, amending the act of August 13, 1894; and

Whereas thereafter the firms and corporations hereinafter mentioned furnished building materials to said Opdahl for use in the construction of said Burke Hall upon the belief and understanding that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had required the said Opdahl to give the bond required by law for the protection of labor and material men and without having any knowledge to the contrary; and

Whereas the said Opdahl did thereafter, to wit, on the 21st day of November, 1912, complete his said contract for the construction of said Burke Hall; and

Whereas thereafter, to wit, on the 30th day of April, 1913, the proper accounting officers of the Government, in making settlement with said Opdahl, suspended the sum of $5,688 as liquidated damages for delay on the part of said contractor in the completion of said work, and which sum was thereafter turned into the Treasury of the United States; and

Whereas the said Silas N. Opdahl ever since the said 30th day of April, 1913, has been and now is insolvent and unable to pay the firms and corporations hereinafter named which furnished him with certain building materials for the erection and construction of said Burke Hall; and

Whereas thereafter, to wit, on the 11th day of December, 1913, Babcock & Willcox instituted a suit, in the name of the United States of America, against the said Silas N. Opdahl and the American Surety Co. of New York, in their own behalf and in behalf of all other persons who supplied labor and material to said Opdahl in the construction of said Burke Hall whose claims for labor and material were then unpaid; and

Whereas said suit has been prosecuted to final judgment and it has been adjudged and determined that the said American Surety Co. of New York was not liable to material men who furnished materials to said Opdahl under his said contract with the Government (Babcock & Willcox v. American Surety Co. of New York, 236 Fed Rep., 340); and

Whereas the various firms and corporations hereinafter named have no relief in the premises except through and by virtue of an act of Congress: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: To the Atlas Lumber Co., a West Virginia corporation, at Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $3,530.65; to C. W. Babcock and T. B. Willcox, copartners as Babcock & Willcox, of Kasota, Minn., the sum of $456.95; to Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., a Minnesota corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $855.94; and to C. H. Klein and C. T. Klein, copartners as the C. H. Klein Brick Co., of Chaska, Minn., the sum of $186.68.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, a similar bill was unanimously recommended by the Committee on Claims and passed the Senate last winter, but failed to pass the House because it came in so late in the session. This bill has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on Claims. The facts are as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior or the Bureau of Indian Affairs in taking the bond of the principal contractor failed to include in it a clause, which the act of Congress required the Secretary of the Interior to include in the bond, for the payment of the claims of the material men and laborers performing the contract. The law does not permit the subcontractors or material men and laborers to have anything to do with the bond or to bring a suit upon it until six months after the Government shall fail to bring a suit for its own indemnification. By reason of that failure of the Interior Department the court held that the bond was not security as the law requires for the material men. The Government having deducted something over $5,000 from the amount of the contract it is not the loser of a dollar, so the Secretary of the Interior has recommended the passage of the bill, as there is no way to appropriate the money for the payment of the claims without an act of Congress. As the claims are to be paid without interest, the Government will still be ahead $200.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 58, providing for the appointment of a special committee to devise a plan for a budget system.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with an amendment, to insert after the word "committee," in line 1, the words "to be composed of 10 members, 6 to be chosen from the majority party and 4 from the minority party," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That there be appointed a special committee to be composed of 10 members, 6 to be chosen from the majority party and 4 from the minority party, of the Senate to devise a plan for a budget system, and that said committee shall report a plan for a national budget not later than September 1, 1919.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] a question. The resolution reads:

That there shall be appointed a special committee.

By whom? Should not the words "by the Vice President" be inserted?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; it was intended by the Committee on Rules that the committee should be selected by the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. Do I understand the Senator, then, that the Committee on Rules will appoint the committee?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; the Senate itself is to select the members of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. The resolution does not so state.

Mr. McCORMICK. The resolution may be corrected in that regard.

Mr. KING. I think that would be implied.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator further with reference to the date. It reads:

Not later than September 1, 1919.

Mr. McCORMICK. That is due to the fact that the resolution was reported a month ago and has not been acted upon.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not be better to fix a later date?

Mr. McCORMICK. Let it be December 1.

Mr. KENYON. I move to substitute the word "December" for the word "September."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, page 1, strike out "September" and insert in lieu thereof "December," so as to read:

Not later than December 1, 1919.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a further question. The committee is to be composed of 10 members, 6 to be chosen from the majority and 4 from the minority party. Does not the Senator feel that that is rather a large committee?

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator from Iowa wishes to amend to make it read five and three, respectively, I shall have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. Would it not be better to make it a committee of seven, four from the majority and three from the minority, to be appointed by the Vice President?

Mr. McCORMICK. In the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I would not care to accept an amendment so far-reaching as that. The committee amended the resolution which I introduced and fixed the number of members and the proportion between the majority and the minority, and the committee intended that the special committee should be selected by the Senate. I do not feel free to accept the amendment to the amendment in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LODGE. If I may interrupt the Senator, the plan of the Committee on Rules is that this committee shall be made up as all committees of the Senate are made up.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to urge a reduction, then, in number, though I think it could accomplish more with a smaller committee. It will be difficult to get them all together.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think in writing in the amendment the clerk of the committee erred in placing the words "of the Senate" at the end of line 3 instead of at the end of line 1. I suggest that that correction be made in the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Transpose the words "of the Senate" from the end of line 3 to the end of line 1, so as to read:

That there be appointed a special committee of the Senate—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMICK. To meet the objection raised by the Senator from Iowa, I move to strike out the word "appointed" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "elected," in line 1.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think there is any necessity for that amendment. The resolution as it stands provides for the committee like any other Senate committee.

Mr. McCORMICK. If it follows the usual form, of course I have no objection.

Mr. KENYON. Permit me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether as the resolution stands the committee would be appointed by the Rules Committee?

Mr. LODGE. No; not at all. We are establishing here a select committee for a temporary purpose, and it will be appointed like all other committees. The names will be brought in by the committee on committees of the majority and minority, respectively, as in the case of all other committees.

Mr. KING. I think the position of the Senator from Massachusetts is correct, for it implies that the body itself shall name the committee, and the amendment suggested by the distinguished Senator from Illinois would not be necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that he will withdraw his amendment?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; I withdraw the proposed amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I call attention to the fact that the language of the rule is:

The following standing committee shall be appointed.

It does not say by whom, but they are appointed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a committee amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to amend by inserting after the end of line 1 the words:

To be composed of 10 members, 6 to be chosen from the majority party and 4 from the minority party.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask to have the resolution read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That there be appointed a special committee of the Senate to be composed of 10 members, 6 to be chosen from the majority party and 4 from the minority party, to devise a plan for a budget system, and that said committee shall report a plan for a national budget not later than December 1, 1919.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks that under the resolution the special committee will take the course of general committees and be selected by the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. That is the language of the rule. I do not think there can be any doubt about it.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 14, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, who lives and reigns in the affairs of men, we thank Thee for all the great men and true who are striving for perfection as individuals, for the purity of the home, the betterment of society, and the higher methods of government in the physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual life.

Grant them success in their leadership, that the fruitions of life may be altogether in accordance with Thy will and good purposes, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 12, 1919, was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—VETO OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a bill, which the Clerk will report by title, with the President's message regarding the same.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend until the Clerk has read the title?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 3157. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] makes the point that there is no quorum present. Undoubtedly there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we have to vote by roll call on the veto, I think the gentleman should withdraw his point of order of no quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose the gentleman made it because, no doubt, it would be made anyway.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We will have a vote by roll call on the message.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his point of order?

Mr. CALDWELL. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—VETO OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. When the point of no quorum was made the Chair had laid before the House the Agricultural appropriation bill with the message of the President vetoing the same, and the question before the House is: Will the House on reconsideration agree to the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the question in controversy has been discussed, debated, and voted on twice by this House. The fact that it has been considered and passed upon on two occasions—first, in the Esch bill, when that bill passed this House by a vote of 232 to 122; second, in this bill, when passed without a dissenting vote—and the further fact that the veto has suspended every legal authority of the Department of Agriculture to continue its activities, I take it that all will agree that we should do everything to expedite the passage of the message. And with that situation confronting us, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MACCRATE. The President having vetoed this bill, are the original provisions of the bill subject to a point of order at this time?

The SPEAKER. They are not. The question is on the passage of the bill over the President's veto. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 248, nays 135, answered "present" 1, not voting 46, as follows:

So, two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the House decided not to pass the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. EDMONDS and Mr. BAER (to override veto) with Mr. ROWE (against).

Mr. HARDY and Mr. IGOE (to override veto) with Mr. SCULLY (against).

Mr. MCCLINTIC and Mr. KING (to override veto) with Mr. FITZGERALD (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having failed to vote in the affirmative, the bill is not passed. [Applause.] The Chair refers the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HULL of Tennessee, has been ill since last Friday, and is unable to be here to-day and vote. I want to ask that he be indefinitely excused on account of sickness. The doctor has forbidden anyone to see him, and I am unable to say how he would have voted on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, leave of absence will be granted.

There was no objection.

CORRECTION.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a correction of the RECORD. On page 2498, containing the proceedings of day before yesterday, Saturday, the 12th instant, an assertion made by me is omitted. Immediately before the words "This morning in the Congressional Library," should appear the following words: "Samuel Gompers was in Springfield, Ill., in November, 1887. He appeared before Gov. Richard J. Oglesby and made a plea for mercy for the condemned Haymarket anarchists. I was there and saw him and heard him."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object, I do not know just what it is that the gentleman wants to have corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves the right to object.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I just want to know what it is that the gentleman wants corrected in the RECORD.

Mr. YATES. The other day, Mr. Speaker, in the House I referred to an alleged statement by Mr. Gompers in reference to the attitude of the laboring men of America, and I stated that I——

Mr. GALLIVAN. I object without any further reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. YATES. Very well, Mr. Speaker.

THE SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute, in which to make a statement in regard to the sundry civil bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, when the veto message of the President was read on the sundry civil appropriation bill, on motion that message and the bill were referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Yesterday the Committee on Appropriations held quite extensive hearings on the question of educational rehabilitation. Those hearings have been sent to the Public Printer in order that they may be printed so that the Members may have copies when that question comes before the House. I am advised that the printed copies of the hearing will not be ready for the Members until very late this afternoon. It is my intention, therefore, to call up the bill to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

The SPEAKER. The House, under the rule, resolves itself automatically into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the prohibition-enforcement bill, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, the prohibition-enforcement bill, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday the reading of section 1, Title I, had just been completed. Amendments are now in order to that section.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IGOE: Page 2, line 1, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the section and insert the words "and the same is hereby repealed."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I make the point of order that that is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask upon what ground the point of order is made?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will state the point of order.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not germane.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard. I am not surprised that this point of order should be made. This bill, which is now presented to the House, is divided into three parts. The first part has to do with what is called the enforcement of war-time prohibition. I desire to call the attention of the Chair, first, to the proposition that in this bill we find incorporated by reference an entire act of Congress. It provides that the term "war prohibition," as used in this act, shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

That reference incorporates in this bill all of the provisions of what is known as war-time prohibition contained in the act of November 21, 1918, or the rider upon the bill for stimulating agriculture.

The bill further provides that certain terms in that act shall be amended. I desire to call the attention of the Chair, further, to the fact that throughout this bill, in sections 2, 3, and 5, there are amendments of the war-time prohibition act.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, first, that the committee in reporting the bill in this shape can not deprive the House of the opportunity to amend or repeal the war-time prohibition act by referring to it instead of incorporating it in terms. As far as this bill is concerned, and as far as the proceeding of the House are concerned, that act might just as well be incorporated in this bill in the exact language of the act of November 21, 1918. Beyond that this bill contains amendments to the act of November 21, 1918; and while it is true that an amendment may not be amended by another proposition which is not germane, yet I call the attention of the Chair to the ruling in Hinds' Precedents, in volume 5, section 5824, where a proposition analagous to this was presented. In that case the House had under consideration amendments to the bankruptcy act, and when the first section was read an amendment was offered repealing the bankruptcy act. The chairman of the committee, Mr. Dalzell, ruled that the amendment was germane.

I would like to have the Chair read that opinion in connection with the point of order just made. Chairman Dalzell overruled the point of order and held that the amendment was in order, and said:

It needs no argument to show that it would be competent to amend the pending bill, disposing of it section by section. For example, section 1 may be amended by striking out the words "amended so as to read as follows" and by substituting the word "repealed," so that the section would read: "That clause 15 of section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The same method may be followed in the case of each and all of the sections of the bill in their order. And this process, in the opinion of the Chair, may be made to reach to other paragraphs of the bankruptcy law than those specifically referred to in the pending amendatory bill, because all the sections of the bankruptcy law are germane to each other.

For example, it would be in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections amendatory of sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be said by some that the war prohibition law is not before this Congress in this bill; but if you will read the first section you will see that the term "war prohibition" as used in this act shall mean what? It means the act of November 21, 1918, and it is just as much in this bill as if it had been set out again in the exact language.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. I wish to call to the attention of the committee that this first section is simply a definition, and you are simply repealing a definition. You are not repealing the act, but the definition.

Mr. IGOE. But, Mr. Chairman, under the guise of a definition there is incorporated an act of Congress; and if the whole act had been set out in this section, I do not believe there would be any question but what we might amend it or repeal it, and the only question is whether by referring to it instead of incorporating it in this act it can be said that this amendment is not germane.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in favor of the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the purpose and intention of the gentleman who offers this amendment, it is clearly an amendment to the war-time prohibition act, not connected with the single amendment in this bill, and the effect of it, if passed, would be twofold: First, it would destroy absolutely the definition which Congress is attempting to place in this bill, defining intoxicating liquor. Without such a definition it would leave it up to the court in each separate, distinct case of violation to determine what intoxicating liquor was, whether or not the particular liquor which had been sold in violation of the law in that case was intoxicating, according to the definition in the State statute, if any there were, and if not, then according to the uncertain evidence pro and con brought before the court. It would just simply hamper the court in enforcing the law and tend to nullify this enforcement law. That would be one result and one effect if this amendment were passed.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PELL. Is there any reason why, in this as in every other law, questions of fact should not be decided by the jury, as they have been for 500 years?

Mr. BLANTON. I tried to explain to the gentleman the other day that when the law defines murder, to the effect that when any person with malice aforethought, either express or implied, with intent to kill and with a deadly weapon, shall take the life of any reasonable creature in being, he shall be deemed guilty of murder, that when the law so defines murder it does not stop there, but defines what each essential element and ingredient of the offense is; it definitely defines malice aforethought as a guide for the court and jury. In defining the ingredients of murder it tells the court what shall constitute malice aforethought. It tells the court what is meant by a reasonable creature in being. It tells the court what a deadly weapon is—that is, a weapon which is well calculated and likely to produce death from the mode and manner of its use—and so forth. Just so in this particular law there is an attempt made by this Congress, as a law-making body, to tell the court what intoxicating liquor is, not leaving it to each particular court and jury to decide.

Violators of the law will manufacture frosty, or bevo, or some other kind of drink with a large enough per cent of alcohol in it to intoxicate, and there will be plenty of witnesses forthcoming to swear that it will not intoxicate, if this Congress fails to do its duty by defining this term.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I should like to inquire what legislation the gentleman is referring to which contains all these definitions that he enumerates?

Mr. BLANTON. I am speaking of the State codes, in those States which have codes. I presume the gentleman's State is under the old common law; and, if so, this definition of what malice aforethought is and what a deadly weapon is, has been understood since a time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and it is carried out and enforced by the courts of the States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is it not always dependent upon the decisions which have been rendered; and are not these things frequently questions of fact? For instance, what shall constitute a deadly weapon is a question of fact.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania mean to tell us that in his State a double-barreled shotgun loaded with buckshot is not ipso facto a deadly weapon under the common law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Why, certainly, no; and no legislative action would be necessary to tell common people that that was so.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, that is just what I am trying to do here.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I was trying to do so, but was led away from the subject by the questions that were being asked. Mr. Chairman, there is an attempt on the part of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, in addition to destroying the definition of intoxicating liquor, to repeal war-time prohibition. I submit to the Chair that that is not germane either to the said war-time prohibition act or to the present legislation under consideration, which in section 1 of Title I amends said war-time act only in the one particular of defining intoxicating liquor. The point of order should be sustained.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the point of order very briefly. In the first place, I take issue with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] in his statement that this bill amends the war prohibition act, except in a very limited way, and especially in this section which he seeks to amend. There are several laws, Mr. Chairman, passed during the last Congress which are known as war prohibition acts. The first law upon the subject was an amendment to the first bill passed for the purpose of stimulating the production of food in the United States. Then in the next food stimulation bill there was an amendment added to that bill which provided against the sale and manufacture of certain liquors to begin at a certain date.

So that in order to identify the words "prohibition act" as defined in this act and defined in section 1 it is made broad enough to refer to any one of those acts, or all of them together.

If this bill were seeking to amend a bill which provided for nothing else except war prohibition, it is questionable whether it would be in order to move to repeal the law itself; it would not be in order unless several sections were involved in the amendment under consideration.

This bill does not amend the war prohibition act except as to the definition of intoxicating liquors. It does not change the penalties. The bill is not an amendment of any section in any previous act or any war prohibition provision. It simply identifies war prohibition acts referring to them in section 1.

It so happens that all the laws that contained provisions for war prohibition are upon entirely different subjects. If the gentleman's amendment is held in order, if it is held to be germane, it not only repeals the several war prohibition acts passed during the last Congress, but the food provision bills passed in the last Congress most of which have no relation whatever to intoxicating liquor.

There was no separate war prohibition act passed. All the war prohibition acts were amendments added to bills which primarily dealt with other subjects independent of intoxicating liquors. So if this amendment is in order as offered by the gentleman from Missouri it not only would repeal all the provisions of war-time prohibition, but the provisions of the food stimulation act enacted during the last Congress because those were the acts referred to in section 1. If it were germane in order to repeal section 1, I deny that it would be germane and in order to offer an amendment to repeal all of them without specifically mentioning what they are and when they were enacted.

It has been held in a number of cases that where a bill is under consideration to amend one section of a given act it is not in order to move to repeal the entire act. I take it for granted that the Chair is perfectly familiar with those rulings.

The one case cited by the gentleman from Missouri is the case where several sections of the bankruptcy act were under consideration, and it was held that it was in order to repeal the entire act. There the entire act was the subject of bankruptcy, and the amendments to the bill being considered were on the subject of bankruptcy. This bill considers not only war prohibition, but it considers the enforcement of the constitutional amendment. If this amendment is held in order, it would repeal the entire legislation of the last Congress, both the agricultural stimulation and the stimulation of food products, which I am sure is not germane.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. It says that the term "war prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I may say further that when the gentleman says there are no additional penalties——

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not say there were no additional penalties; I said it did not repeal the penalties in the original act.

Mr. IGOE. Does it not amend the act by giving new penalties?

Mr. BARKLEY. It provides for the amplification of the offenses in the original act, but that does not repeal the original act; it does not change the purpose; it does not change the tenor; it does not change the letter of the original act; it merely provides the machinery by which the original act is intended to be enforced.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought not to be a question in the mind of the Chair regarding the germaneness or want of germaneness of this amendment when we consider what is done. The citation referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] is with regard to a provision that modified or amended a certain existing law. This provision in the first section of this bill does nothing of the kind. It is merely a definition of the term as it is to be used in the act, and to say that by merely stating that when a certain thing is referred to it shall be held to mean a certain thing; that that allows an amendment repealing the entire act would be carrying the doctrine entirely too far. If the Chair will recall the definitions that are in the second title of this act, he will remember that in the first place the phrase "intoxicating liquor" is defined as used in the act. In the second place, the word "persons" is stated to mean to include natural persons, and, in the third place, the word "commissioner" is defined as used in this particular statute.

In order to do away with the necessity of again referring particularly to a long title and again referring, as in this case, to a number of laws and amendments at great length, the matter is definitely referred to, so that it may be easily had in mind by a statement at the beginning of the section. That is all that is done. The language is that the term "war prohibition act" used in this act shall mean so and so. That is all there is to it. It is not an amendment to the war prohibition act; it is not a provision that enters inherently into any of the provisions of the act; it does not modify them nor change them. It only says that when the language hereafter used in the act stating that war prohibition act is referred to it shall mean so and so. I think it is practically unnecessary to use an argument to show that such reference would be clearly outside of any power that might be invoked for the purpose of repealing or even modifying or changing the terms of the law.

There is a decision referred to in the Rules and Digest, on page 344, in which it is stated that to a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of law rather than to those of the bill was offered and ruled not to be germane. That ruling was by Mr. Speaker Reed. It was also confirmed by Mr. Speaker CANNON and also by Mr. Speaker CLARK in later decisions. I am only citing that for the purpose of showing that certainly if that be true, then the mere statement that a reference to a particular law should be considered as it is considered in this bill, would not warrant going so far as to say that you could amend the act itself, and certainly not to the extent of repealing it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this point of order brings up our old friend germaneness, who frequently comes to life to make trouble for presiding officers in the House and Committee of the Whole. According to the principles upon which the precedents establishing the rule of germaneness rest and which are usually cited in this connection, this amendment is not in order. The point of order in my judgment to the amendment ought to be sustained for the following reason: If several sections of an act are under consideration, there can be no question that under the authority of the ruling precedents, an amendment to repeal the act in question would be in order. That proposition has been settled so positively, and so frequently that it is no longer an open one in this body. But that situation is not presented. The language of the section which refers to the words "war-time prohibition" is taken from existing acts solely for descriptive and definitive purposes, and to save verbiage in drafting the bill under consideration. We often resort to this labor-saving device in the preparation of statutes. It is a matter of convenience, operating to conserve language. By the citation of the words used which are taken from existing acts, the committee merely undertook to say what the words "war-time prohibition" should mean wherever found in the bill which they reported.

The second portion of the section which is proposed to be stricken out, may be fairly regarded as an amendment to the war-time prohibition act, or acts, but if so, it is a single amendment. The precedents are abundant, and have been established, I undertake to say, by every Speaker of this body and by every Chairman of the Committee of the Whole for many years past,—that when there is a single amendment to an act under consideration, either in the committee, or the House, such an amendment will not justify a further amendment proposing to repeal the entire act. That is the pending situation. The language which undertakes to define what shall be intoxicating spirits may, I think, be fairly considered as an amendment to the war-time prohibition acts, but if so stated, it is a single amendment. Hence being a single amendment it does not justify an amendment to the effect of that offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] which designs to repeal the entire war-time prohibition acts.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman says that if there were several sections amended this would present a different question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is the rule.

Mr. IGOE. The bill incorporates by reference the whole act.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. On that contention the gentleman and I differ.

Mr. IGOE. This act, title 1, throughout the provisions, sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, refers to the war prohibition act, and provides new penalties, provides new duties to be performed by different officers, provides a new proceeding in the courts, and are not all of these amendments of the original act? How could you provide new penalties, new methods of enforcement, new duties to be performed by the different officers, unless you extend the original act by amendment?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We are dealing with the first sentence of section 1 of the bill. That sentence says that the term "war-time prohibition act" as used in this act shall mean so and so. In other words a definition is afforded for the purposes of convenience. The gentleman can not by any refinement of legal subtlety, torture the language used, to mean that the President will derive his power to make a proclamation from the present act, and not from the act from which the language cited, is taken.

Mr. IGOE. May I ask the gentleman if it is not also a rule that if an amendment be germane to the whole bill that it may be offered at any place and is not a rule of parliamentary law?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. IGOE. Then if you take the whole bill together and it provides different amendments, why is it not in order?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We have not reached the point where the gentleman has established that this bill presents several amendments to the war-time prohibition acts. We are dealing with section 1, presenting a single amendment and the gentleman's amendment to that section is plainly out of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the Chair can not ignore all of this bill, Title I which is now before the House. The gentleman in his argument admits that there are other amendments to this bill. But now if the Chair will read throughout the bill it refers to this act——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say to my friend I have not admitted anything of the sort.

Mr. IGOE. I draw that from the argument of the gentleman.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman made that statement, I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. IGOE. I think the gentleman's argument admits it. The sections refer to this act and also to the war-prohibition act. Now, the war-prohibition act is the act of November 21. It provides a single penalty and throughout this act there is provided in one section and another additional penalties, different methods of enforcement, duties placed upon different officers of the Government, and I contend, Mr. Chairman, you can not do that without amending the original act which is incorporated in this bill, or at least referred to, and all of it relates back to that particular act. Now, can you say that this House may vote to extend an act, may vote to provide new penalties, new methods of enforcement, and yet deprive the House of a chance to vote whether they should have the act at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The section reads as follows:

That the term "war-prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war-prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

Under that section the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] has offered the following amendment:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the section and insert the words "and the same is hereby repealed."

The part stricken out, according to this amendment, reads as follows:

The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war-prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume."

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] makes the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the paragraph. It has been decided a number of times by the House that to a bill amendatory of any existing law as to one specific particular amendments relating to the terms of the law rather than those of the bill are held not to be germane. I think that is the well-decided opinion of the House and to that opinion I understand the gentleman from Missouri does not object, but claims that his amendment falls within the provision of the decision of this House which was first made in 1902. I read from Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, page 420, section 5824:

To a bill amending a general law in several particulars an amendment providing for the repeal of the whole law was held to be germane.

It is the contention of the gentleman from Missouri that the bill involves the war prohibition act in more than one particular, and therefore is in order. The Chair has very carefully gone through this bill, and is of the opinion that the language which reads: "That the term 'war prohibition act' used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States" does not amend the war prohibition act. The Chair is of the opinion that the bill amends the war prohibition act in only one particular, and that is it puts in an amendment commencing with the words in line 1, page 2, reading as follows:

The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

That is the only amendment to the war prohibition act that the Chair has been able to find which can be dignified by the term of an amendment to the act.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit I would like to call the attention of the Chair to page 3 of the bill where it provides in line 3 that the punishment upon conviction thereof shall be a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned for not less than 30 days or more than one year, or both. Now, the law itself provides in the second paragraph:

"Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such imprisonment and fine."

Now, that is clearly an amendment if the Chair pleases——

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that that provision only provides a penalty for a violation of the provisions of the bill we are now considering if this bill shall become a law. It is not an amendment in any particular of the war prohibition act, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. IGOE. If the Chair has sustained the point of order, very well; but I was going to show the Chair where the act does amend in some other respects. I wish, for instance, to refer the Chair to the provisions of section 3: "That any room," and so forth, "where intoxicating liquor is sold, manufactured, kept for sale, or bartered in violation of the war prohibition act," and also where the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is given power to do certain things.

The CHAIRMAN. Wherein does that amend the war prohibition act?

Mr. IGOE. The war prohibition act contains no such provision as that.

The CHAIRMAN. With the exception of the single amendment just noted the bill now under consideration simply provides machinery for enforcing the act, and does not amend it in any particular.

Mr. IGOE. The penalty for any one thing in the act is one thing, but to extend the act and then provide penalties for a new offense is certainly an amendment of the provisions of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so. The Chair has ruled, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On page 2, line 1, after the word "States" insert the following:

"Provided, That whenever in the opinion of the President it shall be no longer necessary for the purposes of the present war to conserve man power, increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, or ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, he may issue his proclamation to that effect, and from that date the provisions of the war prohibition act of November 21, 1918, shall cease to be of force and effect."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is not germane.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My contention is that the amendment simply attempts to amend the war prohibition act, and that the feature of the war prohibition act affected by this amendment has not been touched on at all in this bill one way or another. There is no extension of the war prohibition act; there is no modification in this bill as to the length of time when war prohibition shall continue in force. If there is any modification of the war prohibition act at all, it is in the last few words, the ones to which the Chairman called attention. That is a question that is open to some dispute, and we will concede that for the purposes of this legislation it may be treated as new legislation. Clearly it is an amendment of a part of the war prohibition act not touched on in this bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the point I had in mind in offering the amendment in the language in which I submitted it is this:

In Title I of the bill H. R. 6810, which relates to the enforcement of war-time prohibition, reference is made to the term "war prohibition act" as meaning the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

Now, it is the contention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, if I understand him aright, that there is no reference in this bill as to time or extension or modification or qualification. That is not a tenable statement, Mr. Chairman, because the very language which I have read provides in Title I how long this prohibition act, adopting the language of the war prohibition act, shall run, because it says it prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization.

Now, it is apparent, it is true——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I prefer to make my statement, after which I will have no objection to yielding. I desire, Mr. Chairman, that I may present this statement without interruption for a few moments, and then I will be very glad to yield to anybody.

Title I, which, in so far as it has any effect, is intended to have the effect of a separate bill, and is disassociated by title from Title II and Title III, provides the exact language of the so-called war prohibition act, which was approved by the President of the United States on the 21st of November, 1918, 10 days after the signing of the armistice by which the conflict between the United States and the Imperial German Government ceased.

Now, in the adoption of that language it is my contention, Mr. Chairman, that this bill carries along with it certain language of conclusion, certain language of operation, because, if it does not, then the language used in Title I is of no effect. If it does not mean what it says, if it does not mean the conclusion of the war and the termination of demobilization, then the English language, in so far as it is adopted in this Title I, is absolutely of no effect. And therefore the position which the chairman of this committee has taken is not tenable, in my opinion, and we start with the proposition that this Title I attempts to write into this bill the language of another bill, and that is the so-called war prohibition bill, by providing that the act or acts shall be held unlawful until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization.

Now, beginning with that proposition—that legal proposition—then anything which amends that, Mr. Chairman, is unquestionably germane.

The question of what is germane is, of course, laid down in very broad and general principles, and its application, the application of that which is germane, necessarily rests upon an individual case. But unquestionably, if there is a general proposition asserted in the bill, anything which operates as a change in that general proposition, either by way of modification or limitation, is, in my opinion, germane, and that is what is intended to have been done here. When Title I says that this part shall be of effect until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the amendment I have offered provides that whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States it is not necessary for purposes of this act to provide that this conservation of food and of feed and of clothing shall be continued for the benefit of our Army and the armies of our allies—and I am not speaking in exact terms, but of what the meaning is—then it must follow that the proposition I have mentioned, giving the President authority to so determine, is a proposition of limitation upon the authority conferred in Title I.

Now, Title I provides for a number of things. It provides for more than the chairman of the committee says it provides for, and section 1 provides for more.

Sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are all adopted amendments of the so-called war prohibition act.

It is the contention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that this particular section—and since it is declaratory of all that goes through the section, practically the whole of Title I—is determined by the few words at the end of the paragraph giving a construction of the meaning of the word "liquors." But it is open to other limitations, Mr. Chairman, of which the limitation I speak of is a most pronounced example, because when we have the language which the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, says is an amendment relative to the definition of "liquors," he, before that, incorporates language which is indeed a definition or statement of how long this language defining "intoxicating liquors" is to continue. In other words, it is to continue at the conclusion of the present war and until the termination of demobilization.

Now, that which is introduced here, as this amendment, is an amendment of limitation as to time, and, of course, any limitation of time is germane, since time is of the essence of the offense, because there is no question but that, when the law is concluded and the period of demobilization is reached, this particular act called a war-time prohibition act was intended by legislative meaning to be inoperative.

That is the meaning of this limitation which I offered by way of amendment, which, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, attaches itself to the limitation or adoption of time in the war prohibition act, adopted in its very terms in Title I.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, upon this identical question the Chair has just ruled as being an amendment to the war prohibition act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that this amendment is a change in form and not of substance, and therefore a restatement of the case is not necessary.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] provided that "the act is hereby repealed." The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] provides for a repeal of the act upon the proclamation of the President. So far as the legal positions are concerned, the two amendments stand upon the same footing, and the Chair feels that it is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to this section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I ask that this amendment be considered first, coming from a member of the committee.

Mr. BENSON. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 1, after the word "States" insert the following:

"Provided, That whenever in the opinion of the President the demobilization of the military forces has progressed to such a point that it shall be entirely safe to permit the manufacture and sale of wines and beer, he may issue his proclamation to that effect, and thereafter the manufacture and sale of wines and beer shall be permitted."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I make the point of order that that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes a point of order, and also the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This, in effect, repeals in part, instead of totally, the war prohibition act. It is exactly the same in principle as the amendments that have already been offered and ruled out. There is nothing in this bill that relates to the length of time that the war prohibition act shall remain in force; absolutely not. We simply recite in the first paragraph the length of time prohibition is to remain in force, and do not attempt to modify it in any way. We do it simply for the purpose of identifying the particular acts. That is all that it does. There is nothing in it that would in any way modify the act, so far as the length of time it is to continue in force is concerned. This amendment clearly attempts to modify it as to beer and wine.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered is offered, of course, in the same thought which attended the offering of the other amendment suggested by me, with this addition: I make the contention—and I consistently make the contention with perfect respect and recognition of good faith in the mind of the Chair—that there have been included by the adoption of title 1, of certain language in the so-called war-time prohibition bill, phrases which control both the length of time which it is to operate and the way in which its termination is to be made. In other words, I contend that the adoption of this language, "until the conclusion of the present war and the termination of the demobilization and the determination of the date by proclamation to be proclaimed by the President of the United States," is clearly an attempt to legislatively adopt the language of another bill, to wit, the war prohibition bill, and that when you make reference to the proclamation of the President of the United States being made, under certain conditions, as this bill does, the termination of demobilization and the conclusion of the present war, to be proclaimed by the President of the United States, that is the language of the bill, that is what this bill intends to do; and the amendment I had in mind, the amendment offered by me, was for the purpose of providing exactly what this particular law provides, a proclamation by the President of the United States, except that it permits the proclamation of the President of the United States to be made in a specific way; in other words, it is directory of the general language. It is a limitation and modification and a direction of the language which before has been adopted in this very bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is clearly subject to a point of order, if not for the reasons already given, then for the additional reason that it goes, perhaps, further than he intended it to go.

The language of the amendment "permits" the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. That permission would do away with the tax, and we are not now considering the tax question, and therefore it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is convinced that there is practically no difference, so far as the legal status of this amendment is concerned, between this and the previous amendment. Both seek the same end, and, without reciting the case, the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEELE: On page 2, line 5, after the word "volume" insert "That the words 'until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization' shall be construed to mean the date when in the opinion of the President it shall be no longer necessary for the purpose of the present war to conserve man power, to increase efficiency in production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the further point of order that it is dilatory. The Chair has ruled on this question already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the further point of order that the amendment is dilatory. The Chair overrules that point of order and will hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This amendment seeks to modify the existing war prohibition act in regard to a matter that is not modified at all in the pending bill. Clearly it is not germane under the circumstances. There is no attempt in this bill to fix the length of time that that act is to remain in force. It simply recites the fact that there are certain acts that remain in force for a certain time, and does not attempt to modify the language of those acts in any fashion. This clearly would be an amendment to the war prohibition act.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has no direct connection with any question of repeal. It does nothing more than the second sentence in the act itself. It simply refers to the identical language which is recited in the first section of the act, and then gives a definition or construction of the language which is set forth in the first section of the act. The very language which the gentleman has just referred to, which he himself has inserted in the act, recites the language of the war prohibition act and says that those words shall be construed to mean in a certain manner, and the construction then follows. In the amendment which I have offered here I do not go back to the war prohibition act as to anything which is not specifically recited in the very act which is now before the House for its consideration, and I cite the very language that is inserted in that act, and then go on to say that that language shall be construed to mean certain things, entirely without reference to the question of repeal and without reference to any of the points of order that have been considered and determined by the Chair heretofore. It is simply doing what the gentleman from Minnesota has done, providing for the construction of the very language which is set forth in this act which the Chair has ruled to be proper and which is in the nature of an amendment, and this certainly goes no further than that. It has no direct connection with or reference to repeal whatever, but is simply a construction of language contained in the bill before the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As I followed the amendment which has just been offered and discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] he undertakes to impress an interpretation upon existing law.

Mr. STEELE. No; on the words in this first section.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand, but those words are taken from existing law. Should the gentleman be successful in his attempt to give to the words of existing law, a meaning which plainly they do not carry, that would unquestionably be an amendment to the existing law. All the language from and including line 4, page 1, down to "The words," on page 2, might be stricken out of this bill without either affecting the bill, or the existing law, save that in the ensuing sections of this measure, additional verbiage intended to be saved by the defining words, would have to be inserted. So far however as the effect of this bill is concerned, and save for the purposes of convenience, the words that I have cited could be safely eliminated. All of those words are contained in existing law, and they are operative, not by virtue of any action of ours to-day, but by virtue of the force given to them by prior enactments of Congress. For instance, suppose the question should be asked whether there are any acts which prohibit the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States? What would be the answer? The answer would be that there are such acts, containing that very phraseology. The language from those acts repeated in this connection, is used merely for the purposes of recital, and not to give them any effect of an affirmative character relating to demobilization, the termination of the war, or the authority of the President.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] has the effect of amending the act described in this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is the statement I have just made.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It makes the time terminate at a different date from that prescribed in the act itself.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly. As I have said, he is undertaking to impress an interpretation upon existing law, and when that interpretation adds to the effect of the existing law, it is certainly an amendment. That being so, and as this act is not proposing to amend existing law at all save in one respect, the ruling principle is, as already decided by the Chair, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order, since it is not germane to the single amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman's amendment were in order, it would likewise be in order, would it not, to offer an amendment stating when the war should end, and in this act we might declare when the war should end?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Precisely. The moment this amendment is held to be in order to the existing acts, that ruling would validate germane amendments to every section of these acts, although these acts are not under present consideration, and before the committee.

Mr. STEELE. The Chair has ruled that the words in the act, "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors in the war prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquor which contains one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol," are an amendment to the original act. The Chair so stated.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; that is true.

Mr. STEELE. There is no such definition in the original act. Therefore it is a modification of the original act to that extent. The words are given a construction in this act. Now, what I am endeavoring to do is just the same as that which the Chair has referred to as an amendment to the original act, which is a construction of the very words in the original act, and also incorporated in this act. It is not amendatory so far as the terms are concerned. It is simply and purely a question of the construction of language which is already inserted in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman desires to refer his amendment to the words in the original act "until the conclusion of the present war," and not to the words in the bill that we are now considering.

Mr. STEELE. They are in the same section, in this very section.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but if the Chair understands the gentleman, he seeks to amend the language of the original act.

Mr. STEELE. It is simply a construction of words in the other part of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the original act?

Mr. STEELE. It is not an amendment to the original act any more than the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to get the parliamentary situation and what the gentleman has in mind. Does the gentleman desire to amend so far as the words contained in this bill are concerned without reference to the original act?

Mr. STEELE. I want to construe the words in this very section, section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that he wanted to amend the original act.

Mr. STEELE. No; the words in the original act are contained in this act.

Mr. BARKLEY. If that is true, would it not follow that the gentleman's amendment would not only interpret the words in this section but the words in the original act?

Mr. STEELE. That is a question of interpretation. I stated the purpose of my amendment, and that is to construe the words in section 1, now under consideration.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a further point of order. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] proposes to construe the words recited in the first sentence of the section, so as to give a meaning to them different from the meaning which they plainly carry in the acts from which they are taken, then his amendment is not germane. Section 1 does not construe the words which it recites from the war-time prohibition acts. The words quoted are taken bodily from existing acts. No meaning is sought to be given to them. The citation is not for that purpose. Whatever meaning they have is by virtue of their place in the original acts. If there are any other war-time acts, identifying phrases might be taken from them and offered as amendments to the language cited. This would be in order. But an amendment which seeks to add something in the way of positive law to the acts from which the words recited are taken, amends those acts, and the Chairman has properly said that this can not be done. The words cited are inserted in the section merely to identify the acts referred to, where the words "war-time prohibition" are used. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is limited, in order, to offering amendments germane to that portion of this section defining the alcoholic content of liquors which makes them intoxicating.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, while the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania follows the second sentence of the first section, as a matter of fact it is intended to amend the terms of the first sentence of the first section. That language is merely descriptive and not legislative in character. In other words, in order to prevent a repetition of the description of the entire purposes of the war prohibition act every time it is referred to subsequently in the act, it is defined, referring to the original description, as embodied in the title. To amend it as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would carry into this act an incorrect description of the original war-time prohibition act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the proceeding, we are now discussing the question of parliamentary law, in which our prejudices for or against the bill ought to have no place, for we ought to keep the parliamentary situation straight under all circumstances. I regard the present stage as covering, first, the decision by the Chair that a motion to repeal the entire act is not in order and can not be permitted, because there is only a single section in this bill that relates to the prior act, and he has ruled that the other sections do not constitute amendments. With all deference to the ruling of the Chair, it did seem to me that the other sections were specific amendments of the prior law, for the reason that amendments may be to change the language or put a new interpretation on the language, or it may be to add something to the law. Every one of these sections adds something to the law. But that is past, and we have accepted the ruling.

The next ruling was upon the basis that there could be neither of these amendments entertained for the reason that they were substantially of the same effect as the first, and therefore were ruled out of order. It seems to me that this amendment stands on an absolutely different basis. We have in the first section, section 1, that which it is true, as the gentleman from Virginia has said, is a recital for the purpose of identifying the act. But it goes one step further; it is more than a recital; it becomes a piece of legislation upon the war prohibition act, for it says that certain language of that act shall be construed as follows, and then gives the construction that is placed upon it.

What have we, therefore, before us in the House? We have simply a question of construction of language. That is what this question raises, a question of construction of language in the war prohibition act.

Now, if you have under consideration the placing of a construction upon certain words, surely it is in the power of this House to take up some other words in the same act and say those also shall be construed thus and so. So I care not whether the amendment relates specifically to the language recited in this section or relates to the language as it exists in the bill. What is before the House now is the question of placing construction upon language in the war prohibition act. You assume to put a construction on a few words, and surely the motion of the gentleman adding to the construction that is placed on a certain other sentence is clearly germane to the legislation before the House.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment is in order, because it is to construe certain words in the bill. I do not see why it would not be in order to take the words in this section of the bill and define them, and that is what this amendment does. It does define certain words in the bill, and if that is not germane I do not see how any amendment could be presented to the bill under consideration. The Chair has ruled out other amendments because they related to war prohibition acts, and certainly this amendment relates to the language used in this bill and not in the other bill, and it is within the province of the House to strike out these words and interpret them or do anything with them that it pleases.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Chair desire to hear any further argument on the point? If he is ready to rule, I do not care to use any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, if this were the original war prohibition act, in which we seek to set a time when it shall terminate, it would be in order for the gentleman to offer his amendment or for any other Member to offer a similar amendment, but that is not what we are seeking to do in this bill. The only particular in which this title amends the original war prohibition act is in the definition of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Is not the definition that the gentleman proposes new legislation? Are you not trying to apply construction to language that the original bill did not contain?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. SABATH. So it is new legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is new legislation, and the gentleman's inquiry is correct with reference to the amendment contained in this section, applicable to intoxicating liquors. That is, this bill says that intoxicating liquors, as used in the original war prohibition act, shall mean a certain thing, but this bill does not attempt to construe or amend the language of the original act, saying when war prohibition shall end. Therefore it is not germane, nor is it in order to offer an amendment seeking to construe that language, because if we could amend the entire language of the war act the Chairman would have no doubt ruled in the beginning that it would have been in order to repeal the entire war prohibition act. Certainly if we can amend all of the provisions of the war prohibition act in this bill we can repeal them all, and the Chair was correct in stating that this title seeks only to amend one provision of the war prohibition act, and that is the definition of "intoxicating liquor," and that any amendment offered here which seeks to change the language or the construction of any other provision of the war prohibition act would not be germane.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] a few moments ago said that in his opinion sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and on down to 7 and 8 all contain new matter, and that they are, in effect, amendments to the war prohibition act. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not even partly true, because this act fixes new offenses, and, therefore, they rest for their validity upon the enactment of this law. They are not amendments to the original act; they do not amend any offense in the original act. They create new offenses by declaring a public nuisance, and so forth, that was not mentioned in the original act.

Mr. CALDWELL. How about section 7?

Mr. BARKLEY. We are not on section 7.

Mr. CALDWELL. But section 7 is a part of Title I, and if Title I in any way amends the war prohibition act more than in one instance, these matters are all within the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. Section 7 means that none of the provisions of this act shall be construed as repealing any former act or nullifying any regulation made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman does not regard that at all as an amendment of the war prohibition act?

Mr. BARKLEY. I certainly do not, in the sense that it would justify an amendment changing the termination of war prohibition.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman contend that it is not within the power of this House at this time to broaden or to narrow the construction that is provided in this section?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not; and there is no word in this section that seeks to broaden or narrow the construction of the original act fixing the termination of war prohibition. It will be in order, I take it, for any germane amendment to be offered broadening or narrowing the definition of intoxicating liquors, as contained in this section, but we are not dealing with that subject now. This bill nowhere seeks to shorten the time when war prohibition shall be effective. It does not seek to lessen the time and it does not mention it or treat of it at all, and therefore it is not in order or germane to offer an amendment to this act repealing or amending the original act in that particular.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. This act treating of war-time prohibition—may not an amendment to the section that has reference to war-time prohibition be offered to provide the time for limiting the operation of the law?

Mr. BARKLEY. Undoubtedly under the rules of the House such an amendment is not in order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not the language in lines 2, 3, 4, and 5 of page 2 constitute an amendment to the war prohibition act by placing an interpretation upon certain language?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it may be fairly construed to be an amendment of that language in the original act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Very well; the subject before the House is the placing of a construction on language. Why can not the House now place a construction upon the words which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] quotes in his amendment? It is still construing language, and that is all it is.

Mr. BARKLEY. For the very good reason that this is not the original act that we are dealing with, but this act only seeks to construe one sentence of that original act, and that one sentence is the meaning of intoxicating liquors. It is in order to offer any germane amendment to our interpretation of that language in this act, but certainly the offering of a provision construing the meaning of intoxicating liquor in the original act does not justify on the ground of germaneness an amendment limiting the term within which that act shall be operative.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Are we not in section 3 dealing with the terms of that act and making an amendment when we add to it this language?—

That any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, etc., where intoxicating liquor is sold * * * is hereby declared a public nuisance.

Does not that, quoting the war prohibition act, add to it by way of amendment by making the property itself liable to be declared a common nuisance?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I do not think, legislatively speaking from a parliamentary standpoint, this is an amendment to the original act. This is an independent act creating offenses which were not contemplated in the original act. It is the creation of a new offense that was not denominated in the original act, and therefore it is not an amendment in a legislative or parliamentary sense, although it is related to the same thing.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if the following language on page 3 is not an amendment of the war prohibition act?—

If a person has knowledge or reason to believe that his property is occupied or used in violation of the provisions of the war prohibition act and suffered the same to be so used, such property shall be subject to a lien—

That is a specific amendment to the war prohibition act by an addition to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not a specific amendment to the war prohibition act, but creates a new, entirely independent offense, which rests upon this act itself for its foundation.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to present in another form the argument so well expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. Section 1, which is under consideration, defines the terms of the "war prohibition act." Then it seeks in the latter part of the section to define what is "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors," and for present purposes that is a part of the section. Now, Mr. Chairman, this amendment which is pending seeks to define other language in the same paragraph, in fact in the same sentence in the original act. I have before me the original act, approved November 21, 1918. From that I read this language:

After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors shall be sold, etc.

Mr. Chairman, there is in the section now under consideration the definition of the words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors," and this pending amendment proposes a definition of the words in the same sentence "until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States." The contention of the gentleman from Minnesota, who made the point of order, and the gentleman from Kentucky is that while this section contains the definition of the words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" and is in the section, and for the purpose of this amendment must be construed as now in the section, yet a definition of the words in the same sentence preceding it is out of order. I submit with all deference that the Chair can not hold that this amendment which is pending is out of order unless at the same time holding that the language in the section of the bill defining the words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" is also out of order. If one is in order, both are in order. The language in the first section of the bill attempts to define certain words in the sentence—that is to say, "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors"—and the pending amendment seeks to define the language in the same sentence "until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States." As I said before, if one is in order both are in order. But at the present time this definition of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors is a part of the section and this amendment seeks to insert a definition of language in the same sentence of the original act of November 21, 1918, and must be in order.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make clear and emphatic that this is a construction of the identical language that is in section 1 and the very act which is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard?

Mr. HAYS. For a moment. Mr. Chairman, by way of discussion whether the proposed amendment is amendatory of the original act or not it has been argued by analogy that the provisions of section 3 are not amendatory of the original act. Now, I challenge the statement which has been made, and say that the true test of whether the provision in section 3 creating a common nuisance and the further provision in section 3 establishing a lien on property, the way to determine whether or not they constitute amendments to the original act is to consider that the original act is not in existence at all. And if it be considered that the original act is not in existence at all, I will ask you by what authority this lien could be enforced or by what authority the building could be declared a nuisance? I think that is a true test to determine whether these specific provisions in section 3 amount to amendments or not. That determines the crux of this particular controversy and the amendment is germane. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] is somewhat different from the amendments which have already been ruled upon. The first section provides:

That the term "war prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

Under that section the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] has offered the following amendment:

Add at the end of the section: That the words "until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization," shall be construed to mean the date when in the opinion of the President it shall be no longer necessary for the purposes of the present war to conserve man power, to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, clothing for the Army and the Navy.

It will be observed that the war prohibition act provides—

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of the demobilization, the date of which shall be determined by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes—

And so forth.

It has already been pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] that he desired to amend this provision of the bill, just as the last part of section 1 of the bill is amended, by the words:

Beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors in the war prohibition act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

If, therefore, this amendment is offered to amend the war prohibition act, it certainly is not germane, and if, on the other hand, it is offered to amend the words that are simply descriptive of the war prohibition act, thereby making this act applicable to a different character of war prohibition act, then certainly the amendment is not germane.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DYER. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: On page 2, line 4, after the word "contain," strike out "one-half of 1" and insert "2¾."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this measure—Title I of this bill—that we are now considering is what is known as the war prohibition act and regulations for its enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment I have offered is to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and light wines having not more than 2¾ per cent of alcohol per volume. It changes the language in the bill from "not more than one-half of 1" to "not more than 2¾."

This, as I stated a moment ago, provides regulations for the war-time prohibition act. It is admitted by most of the fair people that in justice and right this law should not be enforced at this time because of the fact that the war is over and the troops have been substantially demobilized.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, we have regulations and laws which have been enacted that prevent the taking of intoxicating liquors into the camps of the soldiers, and they are prevented from purchasing intoxicating liquors from anyone. And it seems that at this time, with national prohibition coming into force within six months, and with the guarantee in the constitutional amendment that the people of this country would not have prohibition thrust upon them without a year's time, we ought to be willing to vote for this amendment.

When we passed the resolution providing for the constitutional amendment we said that after the necessary States had ratified the amendment, if they did, there should be one year for the people who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of beer, and so forth, to be permitted to adjust their affairs and their business. Now, Mr. Chairman, this war-time prohibition law is doing the opposite that the Congress and the States of the Union said that the people should do. Keeping this in force now when the war is over, when there is no need for it, is simply forcing prohibition upon the people and taking away from them the rights that they had guaranteed to them under the constitutional amendment. It also destroys unnecessarily and in violation of the constitutional amendment much valuable property.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, who has spent months in France, and who ought to know, and I am sure does know, more than any other human being in this country as to the needs of this legislation, this war-time prohibition bill, said in the beginning of this Congress in his message which was read to us on the opening day this:

> The demobilization of the military forces of the country has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and beers.

He said further in his message that he did not have the authority under the act to issue the proclamation at the present time. But he said it ought to be done; that the Congress ought to authorize him to do it.

Now this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is nothing more than to do exactly what the President said ought to be done, permit the manufacture and sale of beers and light wines pending the time when he can issue his proclamation setting aside the whole act. If you will do this, gentlemen of the committee, if you will vote, as I believe you ought to do, for this amendment, which will permit the sale and manufacture of beer and wines during this emergency, I feel that the President would put off the issuing of the proclamation as long as he possibly could, and that would give the country only light wines and beers. And you, gentlemen of the committee, and the American people know that there is practically no harm in light wines and beers, and especially beer of 2¾. It will help to put conditions in this country in the best shape that we can possibly do with the constitutional amendment about to come into effect. It only does what the President recommends and what, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, we ought to do.

We ought not to force upon the people prohibition before they understood it should come into force and effect. We ought to be fair with the great business interests of the country who have money invested in the beer business and in the vineyards and in the manufacture of wine. There are to-day thousands of dollars—yes, almost a billion dollars—in this country invested in the manufacture of beer and wines and like industries. We ought to give those people an opportunity to adjust their affairs. We ought to be fair enough, in view of the President's recommendation and request to the Congress, Mr. Chairman, to vote for the thing that he has asked for and which is fair and just. It is not to put into sale and into the manufacture or sale high-grade intoxicants, but only those that I have indicated, beer of 2¾ per cent and wine and other things that do not have more than that per cent of alcohol.

And not only that, Mr. Chairman, but there has been a great demand all over this country by the people who work. They have appeared before our committee time and again, and they appeared before our committee in a hearing in the last few weeks, men who represent the people who do the work, the laboring classes in the country. We had men before us who had worked in the mills, who had worked in the mines, and they told our committee—and their statements are in the hearings—that if we deprived the men who go down into the mines and come up exhausted from labor and the heat of any kind of a beverage drink—and they only asked for beer and light wines—if we deprived them of those things, Mr. Chairman, these men would become habitues of things that will undermine their health and strength.

They will drink deleterious things that they can obtain, things that contain excessive alcohol, and which may ruin their systems and make them unfit for work. We have had these men appear before us, Mr. Chairman, and they have warned us of these conditions and of these things. Exhaustive investigations made by experts as to the content of beer having no more than 2¾ per cent of alcohol, investigations made by leading scientists and leading physicians all over this Nation, show in effect that there is no harm in drinking beer of 3¾ per cent alcohol, and I trust that gentlemen of this committee, be they in favor of prohibition or not, will vote for this amendment, because it is only for the time for which this act itself is to remain in force and effect.

The President has intimated, the Secretary of War has intimated, that the troops will be demobilized by the end of September. If that is the fact, it will be the duty of the President under this law to issue a proclamation putting in effect again the sale not only of beer and wine, but of whisky and of other intoxicating drinks. He can not separate them. You have refused, through a point of order, permission to the President to separate them and to permit only the manufacture of wines and beer. You are forcing him under the law, if it remains in force, to open up and compel the making and selling of all kinds of intoxicating drinks. But if you will adopt this amendment, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, we will not have any more sale of the drinks that contain much alcohol in them. It will put the country upon the basis that you have wished, that the President has recommended, and we will have an opportunity to study in this country genuine temperance, and the result of it, until the national prohibition law goes into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LUCE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment ignores a very important economic basis for war-time prohibition. It has been frequently urged in this debate that there is no longer occasion for war-time prohibition. Is that true? The act declared one of its purposes to be "conserving the man power of the Nation." Has the end of fighting left no occasion for this? In such a supposition grave danger lies. Spread of the belief that there is no longer need of the strictest economy will but aggravate our perils. No attempt should be spared to acquaint the people with the facts of the situation. We should look those facts in the face.

The world is impoverished. To get an idea of the loss, reflect on a striking coincidence. According to the Statistical Abstract, the total wealth in the United States, the true value of all the real and personal property, as last calculated, in 1912, was $187,000,000,000. An official book just put into our hands, The War With Germany, prepared by the chief of the statistical branch of the General Staff, estimates the total war expenditures of the principal nations to April 30, 1919, at $186,000,000,000. Some of this would have been spent individually for food and clothing had there been no war, but I notice that very little of the total expenditure resulted in producing any goods of permanent value to mankind. It was mainly wasteful expenditure.

Furthermore, there must be added the tremendous destruction of fixed capital, buildings of all kinds, railways and their rolling stock, farms and their equipment, highways, bridges, mines, machinery, ships, countless objects into which the labor of man had been put. The total of fixed capital destroyed would more than equal the wealth in Canada, which may therefore be added to that of the United States in trying to measure the waste.

Imagine then that some convulsion of nature, some upheaval or depression of the earth's crust, should return the North American continent to the conditions of the ice age. Imagine the vast bed of ice forming on the great arctic plains and for four and one-half years crushing its way toward the south. It shatters every house, barn, church, school, factory; erases every railroad, canal, highway; overwhelms every village, town, and city; uproots every tree in forest and orchard; swallows every garden and farm; utterly obliterates every object to which man has attached value between Hudson Bay and the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. When that mighty, resistless flood of ice reaches Cuba its destruction of what we call wealth will have equaled that of the war with Germany.

This wealth must be replaced before the world can be either happy or safe. Men have lost a great part of the tools by which they exist. To this loss may be laid the woes that now beset mankind, the miseries of the greater part of Europe and much of Asia, assassination and revolution, famine and pestilence, suffering beyond measure, death in every form, and of tragedy. From a share in these we can not escape for we are a part of a world where every act of destruction vibrates to the farthest hamlet.

Our own direct contribution to this terrible waste is put at $22,000,000,000—an amount almost equal to that of all the property in the State of New York, including the metropolis itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman—which I do not intend to do—the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and myself are anxious to see if we can fix upon some time upon this amendment and determine how much time there should be.

Mr. TREADWAY. Could not that be arranged at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. DYER. I myself am compelled to leave the Chamber, and, if the gentleman will pardon me, I would like to have the time fixed now.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would like to ask if we could not agree on 40 minutes—20 minutes on a side?

Mr. BLANTON. Will that include five minutes for me, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, his request is for 40 minutes. I ask to amend that and have a vote on this amendment at 4 o'clock.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it an hour. That might not mean anything. There might be only 15 minutes' debate under that.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is that the debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] be limited to 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest an amendment to that, to make it an hour.

Mr. GARLAND. I object.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that the debate on this amendment and all amendments to it be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has the floor. The gentleman from Minnesota can not take him off the floor.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he will not make the time longer than that.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is not the parliamentary status that some one asked for an additional five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and that time has been granted, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DYER. I reserved the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked if there was objection, and no objection was heard.

Mr. DYER. I reserved the right to object, and stated that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] desired to make a request, and that if the gentleman would yield for that purpose I would not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Subsequently the Chair put the question, and no objection was heard. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few more words to say. I had pointed out that our own contribution to this terrible waste has been placed at $22,000,000,000, nearly as much wealth as there is in the State of New York, including its metropolis, and almost twice as much as there is of real and personal property in the whole of New England. Manifestly there is still occasion to conserve the man power of the Nation. We must for many years command from all the people work and thrift and sacrifice; and how better can we conserve the man power of the Nation than by abolishing industries and activities that produce nothing of value and are in themselves destructive? [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to make some arrangement with reference to time. I move that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

Mr. GARLAND. I desire to be heard on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move an amendment to the gentleman's motion, to include the section instead of the amendment; that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be concluded in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Minnesota does not accept that amendment, does he?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I do not think we had better.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The question being taken, on a division, there were—ayes 92, noes 70.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], as amended by the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section and all amendments thereto is limited to one hour.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that half of that time may be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD], and the other half by my colleague [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. I suggest that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent that one-half hour be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and one-half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARLAND. I object.

Mr. DYER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], chairman of the committee, may control one-half of the time and that I may control the other half, if that is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent that half the time be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and one-half the time be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, why does the gentleman want the whole time controlled on that side? I will say that I do not want any time from the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. I asked that my colleague [Mr. IGOE] control half the time, but there was objection made to that.

Mr. RUCKER. Why should it all be controlled over on that side?

Mr. DYER. If my colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] will make a speech in favor of my amendment I will be glad to yield him time.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Is it in order to offer amendments to any part of the section during the hour?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer amendments, but they will not be voted upon until the hour for general debate has expired.

Mr. VENABLE. Shall we just send these amendments to the Clerk's desk?

The CHAIRMAN. They will simply be read for information.

Mr. VENABLE. And we are simply to send them to the Clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in defining in this bill what intoxicating liquors shall be, there is an attempt on the part of Congress not to decide what would intoxicate every individual, but merely to decide what would intoxicate, under ordinary conditions, the ordinary individual of our land, and I assume that that takes into consideration young boys of 17, 18, 19, and 20 years of age, who are not accustomed to the use of intoxicating liquors; because the very primary purpose and object of war-time prohibition was to protect the young man power of this Nation. There will be no question of minority in the future to protect young boys of tender years and intoxicating liquor should be defined.

In 1907 it was my privilege and pleasure, in company with 168 other Texas people, to enjoy the magnificent hospitality of the various bankers of St. Louis, Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, where upon the banquet table in each one of these five splendid cities of our country there were placed four and even five different glasses from which to drink liquor of various kinds.

There was claret and sweet wine and sour wine and beer and champagne, and the bankers' associations in the five cities named by me vied with each other in trying to entertain our Texas crowd more pleasantly than we had ever been entertained before in our lives. Auto rides, theater parties, receptions, buffet lunches at country clubs, steamer excursions, and banquets, at all of which we had this great profusion of sparkling beverages.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield, how does he know it?

Mr. BLANTON. Not by the taste of my palate, but I know by my nose and my eyesight, because I saw four and five glasses, and I saw the contents bubbling and sparkling, and while the contents did not affect the good bankers of St. Louis, the good bankers of Chicago, the good bankers of Philadelphia, the good bankers of New York, or the good bankers of Boston, because all of them seem to be used to it, it did affect some of my good banker friends from Texas who were not used to having four glasses in front of them. [Laughter.] I say you can not decide what is intoxicating liquor by what transpires in St. Louis, Boston, Chicago, New York, or Philadelphia. You have got to decide by the effect that it has on the ordinary individual in this country—in Texas and elsewhere. [Laughter.] It is the young boys and the young manhood of America for whom we are now legislating.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I did not get a chance to speak in general debate on this question. I do not intend to say much now. I have listened patiently to the arguments as to the constitutionality and nonconstitutionality of this bill by the lawyers. They have settled nothing except to their own satisfaction. Each one of them has ended just where he started. For my part, I do not intend to discuss it from the constitutional standpoint for the reason that we have courts for the purpose of settling these questions.

The State Legislature of Pennsylvania voted to sustain the Federal amendment passed by Congress, and at the same session of the legislature they voted that 2¾ per cent beer was not intoxicating. I believe that they were acting honestly. They were certainly not constrained by any feeling against the amendment, because they voted for it. They believed that 2¾ per cent beer is not intoxicating.
